In the face of a protest of forty-six of the prominent men of the town, headed by Aquilla Davis, the committee proceeded about their work, and before the end of the summer erected a church, which was called "The House under the Ledge." But this did not soothe the spirit of discord, and the evil results of this division lasted for some time, as is shown by the vote, which was passed at the November town election not to meet in the new house, and that preaching should not occur there. There was even an effort on the part of some to get a vote to move the house over to the south side of the river. Opposition, however, gradually died away, and in August, 1790, it was "Voted That Mr. Kelley should preach in the new meeting-house for the future, and the inhabitants meet there for public worship." In March of the next year a vote was passed to take down the old meeting-house and appropriate the stuff towards fencing the burying-ground.

A Day of Terror.—The 19th of January, 1810, was, in the central part of New Hampshire at least, a day of terror, one never to be forgotten in the annals of the "hill towns" of this beautiful State. The afternoon of the 18th was unusually warm and mild; the thermometer indicated forty-three degrees, or eleven degrees above freezing. Before light the next morning a winter hurricane was sweeping over the mountains, hills, plains and valleys, snapping off good-sized pine-trees, in its extended path, as if they were but fragile reeds. Great oaks were twisted by the force of the wind like withes in the hands of a giant. Barns were swept to ruin, and sheds of lighter construction were carried away by the storm of wind like chaff. This horrible blizzard continued during nearly a whole day. Nearly all the while the air was filled with fine, hail-like particles of snow, caught up by the gale, so that it was impossible to see more than a few rods away. To add to the gloom of the occasion and its deathly danger, the mercury of the thermometer sank, in the sixteen hours following the previous day's thaw, to twenty-five degrees below zero. The mercury runs as low every winter as it did that day, but mortal man has never known a severer day in this New England. Thousands of fowl were blown away and never seen by their owners again; rabbits, partridges and crows were frozen in the thickest woods; young cattle were frozen solid as they huddled together in the half-open barn-yard sheds, some of which withstood the force of the wind; many cattle perished where they were tied in their stalls.

The heavens roared like the sea in a cyclone. Branches of trees, hay from demolished barns, loosened clapboards and shingles from such houses as had great oaken frames and immense chimneys to hold the structures in place, rose in the air and mingled together in terrifying confusion. The loss of live stock and buildings in Merrimack County aggregated scores of thousands of dollars. The "cold Friday" was known and is remembered throughout the New England States.

A Year without a Summer.—The year 1816 is known among the few old men who remember it as "the year without a summer." In every month there was a severe frost, and the greater part of the crops were substantially destroyed. There are old farmers living in Warner who remember it well. It was often referred to as "eighteen hundred and starve to death." January was mild, as was also February, with the exception of a few days. The greater part of March was cold and boisterous. April opened warm, but grew colder as it advanced, ending with snow and ice and winter cold. In May ice formed half an inch thick, buds and flowers were killed and corn frozen. Frost, ice and snow were common in June. On inauguration day, in June, there was snow to the depth of four inches on a level in Warner; in Maine the snow was ten inches deep. Almost every green thing was killed, and the fruit was nearly all destroyed. July was accompanied with frost and ice. On the 5th ice was formed of the thickness of window-glass in New York and all the New England States. In August ice formed half an inch thick. A cold northern wind prevailed nearly all summer.

Corn was so damaged that a great deal was cut and dried for fodder. Very little ripened in New Hampshire, and even in the Middle States the crop was small. Farmers were obliged to pay four dollars, and even five dollars, a bushel for corn of 1815 harvest for seed for the next spring's planting. The first two weeks of September were mild; the rest of the month was cold, with frost, and ice formed a quarter of an inch thick. October was more than usually cold, with frost and ice. November was cold and blustering, with snow enough for good sleighing. December was quite mild and comfortable.

The Tornado of 1821.—Warner has not often been visited by great and noteworthy disasters, either natural or otherwise. The great whirlwind or tornado of 1821 was the most terrible of the kind that ever visited this section. Many of the older inhabitants of the town still remember the catastrophe, and the path of the tempest is visible in several places after the passage of more than sixty years.

The month of September, 1821, according to the testimony of those who were living at the time, was eminently a season of uncommon storms and tempests. But the most of them, severe as they were, produced little injury in comparison with the whirlwind of the 9th of the same month. The tornado is said to have commenced near Lake Champlain, gathering in violence as it went along. It passed over Lake Sunapee and through a portion of New London and Sutton, and entered that part of Warner called the Gore not far from the base of Kearsarge Mountain. The tempest carried away the barn of William Harwood, injured the houses of M. F. Goodwin, J. Ferrin and Abner Watkins, completely destroying Ferrin's barn and unroofing Watkins'. Next in the path of the wind stood the dwelling of Daniel Savory. Apprehending a storm, Samuel Savory, aged seventy-two, the father of the proprietor, who was himself absent, went up stairs to fasten a window that was open. The women went to assist him, but all were too late. The tornado seized the house in its giant grip, lifted it and whirled it around, burying six of the family in its ruins. The body of the aged Samuel Savory was found six rods away, his brains dashed out against a stone. Elizabeth, his wife, was badly injured by the falling timbers. Mary, the wife of Daniel Savory, was severely bruised, and an infant that she had in her arms was killed. The others escaped with slight wounds.

The house of Robert Savory was also demolished. The family, consisting of eight persons, were all wounded, but not seriously. John Palmer, who lived half a mile away, saw the cloud coming, in shape, as he represented it, like an inverted funnel, the air filled with leaves, limbs of trees and pieces of timber. Before he could enter to give an alarm, the house came down over his head. Mrs. Palmer was considerably hurt, but the rest of the family were not sensibly injured.

Between Savory's and Palmer's the wind tore up everything in its course. Whole acres of corn and grain were swept off clean, trees were uprooted, stones half-buried in the earth were overturned; one stone weighing six hundred pounds was moved several feet.

From this place the tornado passed two and a half miles, sweeping away the buildings of Peter Flanders, killing a Miss Anna Richardson and injuring the infant child of Mrs. Flanders so severely that for several days her life was despaired of. Mr. and Mrs. Flanders testified that no sound of wind was heard, although some might have observed the cloud, until the crash of the building took place, and then all was over in an instant.

The buildings of Deacon Joseph True, in the corner of Salisbury, were next swept away. The whole family was buried in the ruins. Mr. True was saved by a huge timber, which fell endways into the ground, within two feet of the place where he stood, and the other timbers falling upon that one protected him from injury. By almost superhuman exertions he dug Mrs. True and four children out from beneath the bricks, where they were actually buried more than a foot. The oven had just been heated, and the bricks were so hot that in removing them from his children the deacon burned his fingers to the bone. Mrs. True was badly hurt. The youngest child, an infant, seven weeks old, was found at the distance of one hundred feet under the bottom of a sleigh, the top of which could not be found. After this the tornado passed into Warner again, tearing down a barn and passing over a pond, the waters of which were drawn up in its centre, and finally terminated its ravages in this quarter in the woods bordering on what is now Webster.

Lafayette's Visit.—In 1825 the Marquis of Lafayette made his famous journey through the United States. In the course of fourteen months he traversed the whole country, visiting every State in the Union and all the leading cities, and was received everywhere with sincere tokens of reverence and affection. June 22, 1825, he was at Concord, where a grand reception was given him. Among the military companies of the State that were in attendance at that time was the Warner Light Infantry, under the command of Captain William Currier. Monday, the 27th of June, the Marquis proceeded westward to Vermont, going through Warner. When he reached the Warner line an escort of our citizens met him, and Dr. Moses Long made an address of welcome. The party then marched in a formal procession to Captain Kelley's tavern, where the old veteran alighted from his carriage and was conducted to the church near at hand. It was now noon, and, in front of the church, on the level green, stood a long table spread with choice refreshments. The general partook lightly of these, being waited upon by several of the beautiful young ladies of the village. One, who remembered how he looked at this time, says that his appearance surprised every one. He presented a fine, portly figure, nearly six feet high, and his weight of years was lightly worn, his only apparent infirmity being a slight lameness resulting from his old wound at Brandywine.

After the collation was served, and Lafayette had shaken hands with every man, woman and child, the distinguished visitor remounted his carriage and continued his way through Warner, the old and young thronging the door-yards to catch a glimpse of the great man's face. As he passed out of sight the old brass cannon was fired repeatedly, awaking the echoes of the hills around him. And so the "Nation's guest" passed from Warner.

Citizens of Note.—Warner has raised her share of noted characters. Near the northeastern border of the town still stands the birth-place and early home of ex-Governor Ezekiel Straw. At the opposite extremity of the town are the ruins of the old homestead where ex-Governor Walter Harriman was born and brought up. Half-way between these extremities, and under the very shadows of the Minks, was the early home of ex-Governor N. G. Ordway.

Hon. John Pillsbury, ex-Governor of Minnesota, spent a part of his boyhood here, and his brother, Hon. George A. Pillsbury, mayor of Minneapolis, was once a trader in the store now occupied by B. F. Heath. More extended notices will be found of these men in another portion of this volume.

A short distance from the road leading from Warner to Henniker is an old ruined cellar, all that now remains of what was once the habitation of Prince

Hastings. Prince was a negro, who, for many years, lived in the Warner woods, enjoying a local reputation not below that of many better men. Yet Prince was no ninny. He was a great jokist, and could sing songs and play on the bones. Many stories are related of him, but none, perhaps, better than the one told of his being discovered in the mill stealing meal, when he explained, "It is not I; it's Tony Clark." Tony, or Anthony Clark, was another negro, who was quite a character fifty or sixty years ago. He was a fiddler and dancing-master, and probably did more towards instructing the young folks in the arts and graces of politeness than any other man of his day or generation. He was born a slave, served in the Revolutionary army, was a waiter for several years to General Washington, and finally was manumitted and came to Warner to live. Prince Hastings was born free, and, consequently, always regarded Tony with contempt. So, when caught in the flagrant dereliction before alluded to, it was natural that he should charge the deed to his rival, though the manner in which he did it did not materially serve to exculpate himself. Prince died in 1846 at or about, the age of seventy-five. Tony Clark also lived to a great age, dying in 1854, aged one hundred and four years. In honor of his Revolutionary service, they gave him a military funeral, which was a splendid affair.

In 1876 (centennial year) a little excitement arose over the matter of changing the town's name from Warner to Georgetown. A petition, backed by the names and influence of a number of the prominent citizens, was presented to the General Court for this purpose. But a counter petition, containing the names of three-quarters of the citizens of the town, several of whom had signed the first, was also presented, and, after a protracted discussion by the representatives of both parties, the committee decided not to change the name; so Warner it is to-day, bearing the noble cognomen of the patrician councilor whose very name recalls all that wealth and ease and almost baronial greatness that is associated with the great crown officers of colonial times.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

GENERAL WALTER HARRIMAN.¹

The name of no New Hampshire man of the present generation is more broadly known than that of Walter Harriman. His distinguished services to the State, both in the Legislature and in the executive chair, his honorable service as an officer of the Union army, the important trusts he held at the hands of one and another of our national administrations, and, not least, his brilliant gifts as an orator, which made him always welcome to the lyceum platform, and caused him to be widely and eagerly sought for in every important election campaign for many years, combined to make him one of the most conspicuous men in our commonwealth.

The Harriman family is of English origin.

Rev. Ezekiel Rogers, a man of eminence in the church, was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1590. He graduated at the University of Cambridge in 1610. Becoming a dissenter from the Church of England, after twenty-five years of faithful service, his ministerial functions were suspended. He says of himself,—“For refusing to read that accursed book that allowed sports on God's holy Sabbath, I was suspended, and by it and other sad signs driven, with many of my hearers, into New England.” This staunch Puritan arrived on these shores in 1638. In his devoted flock there was an orphan lad, sixteen years of age, named Leonard Harriman, and from this youthful adventurer the subject of this sketch descended, being of the seventh generation.

Rogers selected for his colony an unoccupied tract of country between Salem and Newburyport, Mass., to which he gave the name of Rowley, that being the name of the parish in Yorkshire to which he had long ministered.

The oldest son of Leonard Harriman was massacred, with ninety of his comrades,—“the flower of Essex County,”—in King Philip's War, September 18, 1675, at Bloody Brook. The great-grandfather of Walter Harriman saw eight years of hard service in the French and Revolutionary Wars. His grandfather settled in the wilds of Warner, N. H., at the foot of the Mink Hills, but lost his life by an accident at the early age of twenty-eight. His father, the late Benjamin E. Harriman, was a man of character and influence through an honorable life. He reared a large family at the ancestral home in Warner, where the subject of this sketch, being a third son, was born, April 8, 1817.

Muscle and intellect and the heroic virtues can have no better nursery than the rugged farm-life of New England, and the Warner homestead was a challenge and stimulus to the qualities that were needed in the future man of affairs. This child of the third generation that had occupied the same home and tilled the same soil grew up with a stalwart physical organization and a fine loyalty to his native town, a deep interest in its rude history and traditions, and a sympathy with the common people, which, in turn, made him a favorite with all. To him there was no spot to be compared with his birth-place, and there were no people so interesting and endeared as his old neighbors in the rugged hill-town. A few years before his death he wrote a “History of Warner,” which is regarded as “one of the most systematic, comprehensive and generally interesting works of the kind yet given to the public in the State.”

His "schooling" was obtained at the Harriman district school and at the academy in the adjoining town of Hopkinton.

When hardly more than a boy, he made a successful trial of the excellent self-discipline of school-teaching, and at different times taught in New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts and New Jersey. While in the latter State, at the age of twenty-two, he became deeply interested in the principles of Liberal Christianity (the form of religious faith to which he always held), and occasionally wrote sermons, which were well received from the pulpit, and some of which found their way into print. It was certain, from his early youth, that nature designed him for a public speaker, the rare oratorical gifts which afterwards distinguished him having shown themselves gradually and prophetically in the district school-house and the village academy. This tentative experience in preaching, undertaken of his own motion and without conferring with flesh and blood, resulted in his settlement, in 1841, over the Universalist Church in Harvard, Mass., where he remained in active service four years. Returning now to Warner, and soon leaving the pulpit altogether, he became the senior partner in trade with John S. Pillsbury, late Governor of Minnesota, probably the only instance in our history where two young business partners in a retired country town have afterwards become the chief executives of different States.

In 1849, Mr. Harriman was elected by his townsmen to the New Hampshire House of Representatives, where he almost immediately became prominent as a leader in debate on the Democratic side. Of his record as a party man little needs to be said, except that from first to last, and whatever his affiliations, he displayed great independence in espousing measures and principles which commended themselves to his judgment and conscience, even when it put him in a minority with his political associates. In his first legislative term, on the question of commutating the death sentence of a woman who was sentenced to be hung for murder, he not only advocated such commutation, but was a leader in the movement for the abolition of capital punishment altogether, to which purpose he always stood committed. In the Legislature of 1850 he was the leading advocate of the Homestead Exemption Law, at which time a resolution was adopted submitting the question to the people. The voters of the State gave their approval at the next March election, and in the following June the act was consummated. No Legislature has dared to repeal it, and the foresight and courage of its authors and earliest advocates have been so approved by thirty years of experience that it is doubtful if a single citizen can be found to-day who would desire to undo their work.

It was no accident or trifling smartness that could give a man prominence in those two Legislatures of a third of a century ago. Among the men of marked ability, now deceased, who held seats in those years were Horton D. Walker, Samuel H. Ayer, Lemuel N. Patten, Edmund Parker, Samuel Lee, John Preston, William Haile, Richard Jenness, William P. Weeks, Thomas E. Sawyer, W. H. Y. Hackett, Nathaniel B. Baker, Charles F. Gove, Thomas M. Edwards, Josiah Quincy and scores of others, now living, of equal merit. In this galaxy of brilliant minds it is no exaggeration to say that, young as he was, Mr. Harriman was an honored peer in legislative duty and debate. Besides the two years named he represented Warner again in the House in 1858, when he was his party's candidate for Speaker. He also represented District No. 8 in the State Senate in 1859 and 1860. In 1853 and 1854 he held the responsible position of State treasurer. Appointed, in 1856, by the President of the United States, on a board of commissioners, with ex-Congressman James H. Relf, of Missouri, and Colonel William Spencer, of Ohio, to classify and appraise Indian lands in Kansas, he spent a year of official service in that inviting territory, then turbulent with ruffianism. Border raids, burnings and murder were daily occurrences; but the duties of this office were faithfully attended to, and no breath of complaint was ever heard against the delicate work of the board.

During the reign of that un-American political heresy popularly called Know-Nothingism, in 1854, 1855 and 1856, Mr. Harriman was its firm and unyielding enemy. In a discussion of this question with Hon. Cyrus Barton, at London Centre, Mr. Harriman had closed his first speech, and Mr. Barton has just begun a reply, when he dropped dead upon the platform, a tragedy which lingered sadly in the memory of his friendly antagonist of that day.

The outbreak of the Civil War began an era in the life of every public man in the nation. It projected issues which made party allegiance a secondary affair. It sent many earnest and honest men across the party line, while some of our best citizens simply took their stand for the time being outside all political folds, independent and ready for whatever calls the exigencies of the country might give forth. In that fateful spring of 1861, Mr. Harriman became the editor and one of the proprietors of the Weekly Union at Manchester, which heartily espoused the war policy of Mr. Lincoln's administration for the preservation of the republic, and thus found himself the leader and spokesman of what were known as the "War Democrats." He was placed in nomination as a candidate for Governor of the State at a large mass convention of this class of voters, held at Manchester in February, 1863, and the movement resulted in defeating a choice by the people and throwing the election into the Legislature.

No man uttered braver or more eloquent words for the Union cause than Mr. Harriman, and his tongue and pen were an important element in the rousing of the citizens of New Hampshire to the graver duties of the hour. In August, 1862, he was made colonel of the Eleventh New Hampshire Regiment of Volunteers. He led his regiment to the field, and was at its head most of the time until the close of the war, except the four months, from May to September, 1864, when he was an inmate of Confederate prisons. With some other captured Union officers, he was for seven weeks of this time imprisoned in that part of Charleston, S. C., which was most exposed to the fire of the Union guns from Morris Island; but, providentially, though that part of the doomed city was destroyed, no harm came to him from the guns of his fellow-loyalists.

The first set battle in which the Eleventh Regiment bore a part was that of Fredericksburg, in December, 1862, when, with unflinching courage, Colonel Harriman and his men faced the dreadful carnage of that long day before Marye's Heights, less than three months after their arrival in the field. The loss of the regiment in this engagement was terrific. Passing over much (for want of space) that is thrilling and praiseworthy, we find the Eleventh, under their colonel, at the front in the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864, where they made a daring and stubborn onset on the Confederate entrenchments, carrying before them two successive lines of the enemy's works. But among the five thousand Union men that were captured in that bloody engagement, the commander of the Eleventh New Hampshire was included. Colonel Harriman and the survivors of his charge were present at the final grapple of the war, before Petersburg, and on the 3d day of April, 1865, he led a brigade of nine regiments (a force three times as great as the whole American Army at Bunker Hill) into that fated city on the heels of Lee's fleeing command. The war was now virtually ended; the surrender of Lee at Appomattox followed six days afterward, and the Eleventh Regiment, of proud and honorable record, was mustered out of service the following June. Their commander was appointed brigadier-general United States Volunteers, by brevet, "for gallant conduct during the war," to date from March 13, 1865.

On his arrival home, at the close of the war, General Harriman was elected to the office of Secretary of State by the Legislature then in session, and he at once entered upon the duties of the office, which he held two years, and until his promotion to the gubernatorial chair. In the large Republican Convention, consisting of six hundred and seventy-five delegates, and held at Concord in 1867, he was nominated on the first ballot as candidate for Governor of the State. One of the most salient and memorable incidents connected with this period was the joint canvass, made by amicable arrangement between General Harriman and the Hon. John G. Sinclair, the Democratic candidate. Such canvasses are not uncommon in the West and South; but in New England, and with men of such forensic ability as the distinguished nominees possessed, it was an event fraught with great popular interest, and which drew forth, possibly, the most earnest and eloquent discussions of questions to which a New England people has ever listened. Many flattering notices were given of these discussions; there were thirteen in all. Commenting on one of the number, a leading newspaper said of General Harriman: "Soaring above all petty personal allusions, he held the audience as if spell-bound, and made all his hearers, for the time being, lovers of the whole country—of the Union, of liberty and independence throughout the world. He spoke not as a politician, but as a patriot, a statesman, a philanthropist, and his noble sentiments had such power of conviction that it was impossible to ward off the results by argument." His election followed by a decisive majority.

The campaign of 1868 occurred at a time when a strong reaction was setting against the Republican party throughout the country. Fresh candidates for the Presidency were about to be nominated; the impeachment of Andrew Johnson was in progress; military rule had been established in the South; utter financial ruin was hotly foretold; and the dominant party was suffering crushing reverses in many of the States. To add to the discouragements of this party in New Hampshire, when the municipal election came on, in December, Portsmouth and Manchester rolled up adverse majorities, and the tide was tending strongly in one direction. Encouraged by such promising signs the Democratic party held its State Convention at the early day of the 14th of November. Their old and tried war-horse, John G. Sinclair, was again put upon the track, and his election was, by that party, deemed a foregone conclusion. A long and fierce contest ensued. Governor Harriman met his fellow-citizens face to face in every section of the State. He addressed immense meetings, holding one every secular day for six weeks, and failing to meet no appointment on account of weariness, storms or any other cause. He was triumphantly re-elected, obtaining a larger vote than any candidate for office had ever before received in New Hampshire.

Of Governor Harriman's administration of the affairs of the State, in its principal features, with the exacting duties and the keen prudence required of the chief executive in those days of large indebtedness, unbalanced accounts and new legislation to meet the new and unprecedented demands, his constituents seem to have been hearty and unanimous in their approval. Their feelings may be summed up and expressed in the words of the Boston Journal when it said: "The administration of Governor Harriman will take rank among the best that New Hampshire has ever had."

General Harriman was appointed naval officer of the port of Boston by President Grant in April, 1869, which office he accepted after the expiration of his gubernatorial term, in June following. He was reappointed in 1873 for a term of four years. The affairs of this office were conducted in such a manner as to preclude any word of criticism.

General Harriman engaged in political canvasses repeatedly in most of the Northern States, and in 1872 he participated extensively in the State campaign in North Carolina. In this later canvass the key-note of the national campaign was pitched, and the result of the desperate contest there in August made the reelection of General Grant in November a certainty.

Thousands have warmly testified to the rare oratorical powers of the subject of this sketch, the Meriden (Connecticut) Recorder being one of the number. That paper says of him: "As a platform speaker we never heard his equal. His delivery is fine, his logic clear as a crystal, his manner easy and natural and his physical force tremendous. With a voice clear and distinct as a trumpet, of immense compass, volume and power, his influence over an audience is complete. He affects nothing, but proceeds at once to the work in hand, and from the very outset carries his hearers with him, rising at times with the inspiration of his theme to the loftiest flights of eloquence."

In 1881, General Harriman was chosen to the Legislature from Concord, and in the Hall of Representatives, where he had stood over thirty years before, he took a fearless and independent position on the great questions that were agitated at that session. In 1882 he made an extended tour through Europe and portions of Asia and Africa, visiting London, Paris, Rome, Athens, Alexandria, Cairo, Jerusalem and many other places of note, going to the heart of the great pyramid and bathing in the Dead Sea and the waters of Jordan. On his return he wrote a book of his travels, which was his last work, entitled "In the Orient." The book is characteristic of the author, who saw much in a short time, and taking one rapidly through that interesting country, on foot and horseback, where brave armies fought and where patriarchs, prophets and Apostles went. The book was published by Lee & Shepard, of Boston, and two editions have been sold.

General Harriman was twice married: first, in 1841, to Miss Apphia K. Hoyt, daughter of Captain Stephen Hoyt, of Warner, who died two years afterwards; and again, in 1844, to Miss Abigail R. Andrews, of Warner, who survives him. By the latter marriage he had three children,—Georgia, the only daughter, is the wife of Joseph R. Leeson, an importer, of Boston; Walter C., the oldest son, a lawyer in Boston; the younger son, Benjamin E., having prepared himself for the medical profession at some of the best schools in the land, took his degree at Dartmouth College in 1877 and began practice in Manchester, N. H.; but his health soon failing, after patient and determined efforts for its recovery, and after attempting, in Troy, N. H., to follow his profession, where, in a short space of time, he acquired a large practice and aroused the strongest feelings of friendship and sympathy of the people, he returned to his father's home in Concord, where he died of consumption and a heart difficulty May 23, 1880, lamented not only by his own family, but by a large circle of devoted and enthusiastic friends. His wife, so early bereaved, was Miss Jessie B., only daughter of the late Colonel Isaac W. Farmer, of Manchester.

A biographical paper, read before the New Hampshire Medical Society by Dr. A. H. Crosby, a physician of wide reputation, and printed, portrays the character of Dr. Harriman in generous outline and fine and tender tinting. He was a young man of a keen mind and of high integrity, large capacities for friendship and superior equipment for his life-work. There are two grandsons and one granddaughter of General Harriman's surviving children to represent the family.

In the month of July, 1883, General Harriman was prostrated, although apparently in his usual health, with cerebral embolism, resulting in aphasia, and although he made a wonderful and unexpected recovery therefrom, it was evident that his days on earth were hastening to a close. Early in the spring of 1884 he became confined to his home. Calmly he awaited the great transition, as the shadows gathered about him, with the oft-expressed wish that it might come suddenly and that his days of weariness might not be prolonged.

Like passing into a deep sleep, he died on the morning of July 25th. His remains repose in Pine Grove Cemetery, beneath a tall granite shaft, among his kindred, where the waters of the river ripple below and in full view of the hills that overshadow the place of his birth.

BENJAMIN EVANS.

Benjamin Evans, son of Tappan Evans, was born at Newburyport in 1772, but was brought to Warner with the family before 1780. His mother was called the "handsomest woman in Newburyport," and the son was a man of striking personal appearance. The writer has been unable to gather many facts in relation to the early life of this noted man. His education was limited, but, having commanding natural abilities, he wielded a large influence in Warner and in the State for many years. He married a Miss Wadleigh (an aunt of the late Judge Wadleigh, of Sutton) and commenced life at Roby's Corner. There he had a farm and saw-mill, the mill being a few rods below the present river bridge. In 1803 he went into mercantile business at South Sutton and at once became a prominent and influential man in the town. Though he only remained at Sutton four years, he served several times as moderator at town-meetings and several times as selectman. In 1807 he returned to Warner and made his home from that time through life at the village.

He was the leading business man in town for a long period of time; besides carrying on his country store, he dealt largely in cattle.

He lived some twenty-five or thirty years in what is now known as the Bates house, and the remainder of his life at the Porter house. He was a soldier in the War of 1812. He knew every man in town and could readily call each man by name. He served as moderator of town-meetings, as selectman and as representative to the General Court a great many years.

He was elected Senator in old District No. 8 in 1830, and was in the Governor's Council in 1836 and 1837. He was appointed sheriff of Merrimack County in 1838 and held this, his last office, till 1843, the year before his decease.

His children were Abigail, married Reuben Porter; Susan, died in infancy; Susan (2d) married Dr. Eaton; Lucinda, married Nathan S. Colby; Sophronia, married Stephen C. Badger; Sarah, married H. D. Robertson; Hannah M., married Abner Woodman (he was a farmer and did considerable justice business in settling estates in the town of Warner); Benjamin, the last child, died at the age of six years. Mrs. Hannah M. Woodman¹ is the only surviving child of the late Benjamin Evans, and furnishes this illustration as a tribute to her father's memory.

LEVI BARTLETT.

Levi Bartlett, oldest son of Joseph Bartlett, was born in Warner, N. H., April 29, 1793, and is, therefore, at this date, ninety-two years of age.

His grandfather, Simeon Bartlett, of Amesbury, Mass., a brother of Governor Josiah Bartlett, of Kingston, N. H., who was first after General Hancock to vote for and to sign the "Declaration of Independence," was one of the original proprietors of the town of Warner, and he gave to his three sons, Joseph, Richard and Simeon, valuable tracts of land in the then newly-settled township.

The Bartlett family are from Stopham, Sussex County, England. John and Richard, progenitors of most of the name in this country, came over in 1634 and 1635, and settled at Newbury. They trace back their family for over eight hundred years of unbroken pedigree. Sir Walter B. Bartletot, a lineal descendant of Adam Bartletot, who came over with William, the Conqueror, now inherits the old family estate, consisting of some seven or eight thousand acres.

Sir Walter is member of Parliament, a Conservative and a staunch supporter of the Queen.

The subject of the present sketch, Levi Bartlett, of Warner, was early employed in his father's store, at the Lower village. A country store was then, even more than now, the centre of all masculine gatherings for the interchange of news and political and religious ideas. The incidents of the Revolutionary War were still fresh in the minds of the old habitues of the place, and the lad, always eager for information, listened with breathless interest to tales of daring and heroic deeds, and gazed with flashing eye as some old veteran of the war "shouldered his crutch and showed how fields were won." Added to the history of his country they orally delivered were the contents of the town library, kept at his father's store, and supplied, among other works, with copies of most of the popular histories then extant,—Hume, Gibbon, Goldsmith, etc.,—and while the rest of the family were gathered of an evening in the "east room" for social and neighborly converse, the young man, stretched on the old-fashioned kitchen settle, read, by the light of a tallow candle, or possibly by a blazing pine-knot, history, Shakespeare, translations of Virgil and Homer, or whatever else of poetry or romance those early times afforded. His extreme predilection for agriculture was fostered, if not induced, by the "Georgics," read at that susceptible age. Opportunities for education were very limited in those days, and the common district school did not set ordinary pupils very far on the road to knowledge. Private instruction, through a couple of winters, by Hon. Henry B. Chase, then a rising young lawyer of the town, and a "finishing term" at Amesbury Academy were all the additional scholastic advantages enjoyed by Mr. Bartlett. This rather meagre training was, however, largely supplemented in his case by constant, varied and extensive reading, and by a critical study, in later years, of geology, chemistry and other works connected with what was then dubbed, rather sneeringly, by the popular voice as "scientific farming." He was sent early to Newburyport to the book-store of Thomas & Whipple, and later to the store of his uncle, James Thorn-dike, of Salem, Mass., with the expectation that he would engage in mercantile pursuits. But he had little taste for "trade" and the embargo and non-intercourse with foreign nations, owing to the unfriendly and exasperating conduct of England, which worked so disastrously upon the fortunes of those once opulent merchants in the "City by the Sea," completed the disgust of young Bartlett for that occupation. The trade of tanner and currier appeared to him the only safe and lucrative business, and his father arranged to set him up accordingly.

He pursued this avocation for several years, but the passion for agriculture, which had all this time found vent in the cultivation of fruits and flowers, grew too powerful to be resisted, and he left what was fast becoming a lucrative employment for the pursuit of farming, which he has since followed.

He began at once to write for agricultural papers, experimented largely in different ways of managing crops, adopted most of the new theories of scientific men in relation to the constitution of the soil and its adaptation to certain growths, etc. His opinions and writings were favorably received, and he, as pioneer in a new field, since pretty thoroughly investigated, was considered "authority" on most points relating to improved agriculture.

In 1834, Mr. Bartlett was invited to become a regular contributor to the New England Farmer, and from that date till after he had passed his eightieth year he wrote regularly for various agricultural periodicals. He was special correspondent and associate editor of the Boston Journal of Agriculture during its brief life. He wrote constantly for the Country Gentleman, occasionally for the Farmer's Monthly Visitor, The Statesman and Manchester Mirror and many other papers. He was for a time associate editor of the Boston Cultivator. His writings have been published in various States of the Union, and not unfrequently copied into English papers.

When an Advisory Board of Agriculture met at the Patent Office, Washington, D. C., in 1859, Mr. Bartlett was selected by a committee of that board to represent New Hampshire, and he was present during its session of eight days.

A year later, when a series of important lectures on scientific agriculture was to be given at Yale College, Hon. Henry B. French, then of Exeter, late Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and Mr. Bartlett were invited from this State to be present.

After he had passed his eightieth birthday he began and completed a "Genealogy of the Bartlett Family," which has been largely called for all over the country.

The work cost a vast amount of labor and research, and proved a very trying labor for the aged compiler.

In politics Mr. Bartlett has been an "old-time Whig," and in a town which was for many years the very "keystone of the Democratic arch" in New Hampshire, was seldom troubled with offers of office, but held the office of postmaster for five years immediately preceding General Jackson's term at the White House.

It is curious to note the difference in that "institution" between those years and the present time. Mr. Bartlett declares that more papers and letters are received in a single day now at our office than he distributed in the course of a whole year.

Mr. Bartlett married, June 1, 1815, Hannah Kelly, only daughter of Rev. William Kelly, the first minister of Warner. They had two children, who lived to mature age,—William K., who married Harriet N., daughter of Nathan Walker; Lavinia K., the daughter, married Dr. Dana D. Davis, who died soon after of yellow fever in Baton Rouge, La., where he was in the practice of his profession. Their only child, William D. Davis, married Louise Harding, of Virginia, and is a clerk in the Custom-House, New York City.

[A difference of opinion seems to exist concerning the derivation of the name of this town. Hon. Walter Harriman claimed that it was named in honor of Seth Warner, of Bennington, Vt., while others claim that it derived its name from Hon. Daniel Warner, of New Hampshire. Isaac W. Hammond, however, author of "Town Papers," and an indefatigable searcher in matters relating to the early history of New Hampshire, says he "finds himself of the opinion that Governor Wentworth named the town for his intimate friend, Colonel Jonathan Warner, of Portsmouth, who married a cousin of the Governor, and was, at the time of the incorporation of Warner, a member of the Governor's Council."—PUBLISHERS.]

HISTORY OF WEBSTER.

BY MISS E. M. BUNTON.

CHAPTER I.

Introductory—Description—Industries—Early Settlements—Incorporation.

Introductory.—The historical instinct, if we may use the expression, is not strong in Americans. We have been too intensely busy with the present to spend much time in gathering up the story of the past. But we are beginning to realize the great value of our heritage of history. States, counties, towns and families are searching among records and traditions, trying to weave the scattered and broken threads into something like continuous narrative. The sketch here presented in behalf of the town of Webster is exceedingly fragmentary, having been prepared under great disadvantages. This word of apology is due, not to the writer, but to the citizens of Webster. Much of the material used has been drawn from the "History of Boscawen," by Rev. Ebenezer Price, published in 1823, and from the "History of Boscawen and Webster," by Charles Carleton Coffin, published in 1878. The writer would acknowledge also assistance furnished by Messrs. W. W. Burbank and Sherman Little. Another esteemed citizen of Webster should also be named here, whose record henceforth is on high—Mr. Ephraim Little. He was familiar with the history of his native town, and was greatly interested in gathering materials for this work, but died before he had put them in shape to be used.

Webster looks back with a just pride upon her past. Those early settlers who gave character to the town were men of sturdy natures, courageous, persevering, clear in their perceptions of right and of duty, positive in their opinions, abounding more in solid sense than in refinement. These qualities have appeared in a marked degree in all the subsequent history of the town. The institutions of the gospel and of education were among the first cares of those who came to the wilderness, and these have exercised their own softening and refining influence on the generations who have succeeded. The results of this influence have been felt, not only within the limits of Webster, but wherever the migratory spirit has led her sons and daughters. These are filling honorable positions on the Pacific slope, in the great Northwest and in the Mississippi Valley. Such men as Jacob Little, in Ohio, and Henry Little, in Indiana, have laid a strong molding hand on thousands of the inhabitants of those and other States, and have helped to make the interior of our country what it is to-day.

In common with many of the country towns of New England, Webster has decreased in population within the last forty years, and the present inhabitants speak with a shade of sadness of the large families and the crowded school-houses of a half-century ago. But the fountain does not complain because it cannot keep all its waters at home. It sends them forth in streams which carry life and verdure hither and thither until at last the clouds bring them back again. So to the country hill-sides of New England come back the blessings and prayers of those who have gone forth to other homes.

Description.—More than a century and a half have passed away since John Coffin and eighty other citizens of Newbury petitioned the General Court of Massachusetts Bay for "a grant of land situated on the west side of the Merrimack, adjoining Penacook plantation." The grant, which was obtained the following year, lays down the boundaries of the proposed township as follows:

"A plot of township of land granted at [by] the Court to John Coffin and others, lying on Merrimack river, above Pemecok, surveyed by Richard Hazen and two chain men on oath, being bounded as follows, viz.: beginning at the middle of Contoscook river, when it empties into the Merrimack, where it joins the Penacook Plantation; thence running west, 15° South, adjoining Penacook line, four miles, to a white pine tree, marked for Penacook corner bound; thence, further on, the same line three miles and eight poles to a Norway pine marked for the corner bounds; thence turned at right angles and running North 15° west seven miles and eight poles, to a crooked white birch lettered and standing on the southeast side of a hill, which is the North west corner; thence turned at right angles and run east 15 deg. north, near seven miles and a half, to a white oak and two white pines marked, by Merrimack river, and by said river as it runs to Contoscook River."

This was known by the Indian name of Contoscook, until the formal incorporation of the town, in 1760, when it took the name of Boscawen, in honor of Admiral Boscawen, who distinguished himself in the British navy during the French and Indian War and at its close. The present article has to do only with the western part of this tract, which, in 1860, became a separate town, bearing the name of Webster. The account of the division of the old town will be given more at length hereafter.

Webster is an agricultural town, possessing a varity of soil adapted to farming and grazing, with a good proportion of forest growth. Oak and maple, pine and hemlock are abundant. The Blackwater River runs through from north to south, affording several good water privileges. The surface is diversified with hill and dale, abounding in bits of the most picturesque scenery. The chief eminences in the town are Little Hill and Cook's Hill in the north part, Corser Hill in the east, Pond Hill in the west, and Rattlesnake Hill southwest of the centre. Long Pond is a beautiful sheet of water, nearly two miles long and from one-half to three-fourths of a mile wide, towards the west part of the town, at the foot of Pond Hill; while, on the east, Great Pond lies on the boundary between Webster and Boscawren.

From various points in the town commanding views may be obtained of landscapes presenting an endless variety of feature. One of these "mounts of vision" is on Little Hill. Looking toward the southwest in a summer morning, one sees Long Pond nestling among the surrounding hills, reflecting in its glassy surface every line of their contour with wonderful clearness. The farm-houses of White Plain can be seen here and there, almost hidden among the trees, until the narrow valley broadens out into a vista of sunny slopes, blending at last with the sky.

The highest land in Webster is the hill west of the house of Captain William D. George, which probably has an elevation of between nine hundred and one thousand feet. Mount Washington is plainly visible from that point in a clear atmosphere. The elevation of Corser Hill Meeting-house is seven hundred and eighty-six feet. Mount Kearsarge, with its graceful outline, is seen to fine advantage from Corser Hill, while from the height of land south of the house of Mrs. John Sanborn a rare view may be enjoyed in a clear day eastward, westward and northward, including some of the White Mountain peaks.

From Sanborn Hill, in the west part of the town, the eye sweeps over an extensive landscape, by no means inferior in its varied beauty to those already mentioned.

A small village clusters about the Congregational Church on Corser Hill, and a mile southwest of that is the larger village of Sweatt's Mills, containing the Methodist Church, post-office and the Blackwater Mills, which are at present closed. There are two stores in town, one kept by George Little on Corser Hill, and the other by Arthur C. Call at Sweatt's Mills.

The location of the town is a healthy one and people grow old here. At the opening of the present year (1885) there were fifteen individuals in town over eighty years of age and two of these were upwards of ninety.—Mr. Jacob Waldron, ninety-four, and Mrs. Amos Corser, ninety-two. Both have died since the beginning of the year.

The population of the town, according to the census of 1880, is six hundred and forty-seven.

Industries.—Lumbering has always been predominant among the industrial interests of Webster. The first saw-mill was built by Henry Gerrish in 1779, on the Blackwater, a little above the mill now owned by W. W. & L. A. Burbank. That at the outlet of Long Pond was built about 1800 by Jeremiah Gerrish, and somewhat later the mill on the Blackwater, a little north of Dingit Corner, and the Danforth and Jackman Mills farther down the river. Pillsbury's mill was built about 1809. The mill on Knight's Meadow Brook was built by Henry Little about 1825. The first clapboard-mill was below the Pillsbury mill and was built by Colonel John Farmer. The second was built in 1834 and is still in use, being owned at present by W. W. & L. A. Burbank. The first grist-mill was the Norris Mill, at Sweatt's Mills. There was also one run of stones in Pillsbury's mill.

In the early part of the century there were two fulling-mills in town, one at Sweatt's Mills and the other at Burbank's Mills. Both were run at one time by Paul Pearson. At Sweatt's Mills, when the river was low, the fulling-mill and grist-mill were run alternately, one by day, the other by night.

Coopering was carried on by Captain Boyden, Jabez Abbott and Benjamin Sweatt. At Sweatt's Mills a building, put up originally for a carding-mill, was used for a long time as a match-mill. The manufacture of hats was carried on by Mr. Columbus George, on White Plain. Cut nails were made by Jeremiah Gerrish, on the place now owned by Charles D. Glitten. They were cut out of hoop-iron with large shears, driven by horse-power.

At the present time the manufacture of shingles, broom-handles, chair-stock, etc., is carried on by James Snyder, on the mill-site on Blackwater River, near the residence of Samuel Little. Box-making is a special branch of business at Burbank's Mills, together with general lumber business and making of chair-stock. In 1881 between five and six thousand dollars were paid out by F. L. Burbank & Son for labor, including teaming.

Early Settlements.—In 1745, Thomas Cook built a log cabin in the northeast part of what is now Webster, near "Mutton Road," and not far from the swell of land which bears his name. This was probably the first house built in the town. Upon the breaking out of Indian hostilities in the following year, he deemed it prudent to leave his cabin, but was killed at Clay Hill in May, 1746. During the peace which followed the first outbreak of Indian warfare, Edward Emery built a house at the foot of Corser Hill, on the south side of Long Street, on land now owned by Miss Nancy Couch. He moved his family thence to the fort, upon the second Indian attack, and the house was riddled by the savages. It is not known that he ever occupied it afterward. In 1756 he, with Ezekiel Flanders, was killed by the Indians at Newfound Lake, whither they had gone to hunt beavers. Permanent settlements began about 1763.

Benjamin Day was probably the first settler. He built a house on land now owned by Mr. John Dodge. About the same time Jonathan Cass built a house by Long Pond, near the house lately owned by Mr. David Sweatt, the foundations of which may still be seen. These two were the only houses west of the Blackwater when, in 1774, Enoch Little built his house on Little Hill. The first framed house in Webster was built by Mr. David Corser, on Corser Hill, and is now occupied by Mr. Tilton.

Not far from 1795, Mr. Stephen Putney bought and cleared the farm in the south part of the town, on which his son, Mr. Charles E. Putney, now lives. A little later, William Clough settled on Sanborn Hill, west of Pond Hill, and, shortly after, Mr. Tristram Sanborn built a house near where his son, Jesse Sanborn, lives at present. In Bashan, Moses Gerrish and William Danforth settled, perhaps a little earlier. From 1775 to 1800, settlements rapidly increased. "In the year 1777 there were probably not more than ten legal voters west of Beaver Dam. In thirteen years the number had increased to seventy-one." From this time until 1860—the date of the incorporation of Webster—its civil history is hardly separable from that of Boscawen. Mr. Coffin, in his excellent "History of Boscawen and Webster," gives a variety of facts in regard to the "west end of the town," some of which will be given nearly in a chronological order.

Up to 1791 there was no meeting-house in the territory now called Webster, the only place of worship in Boscawen being at the northwest corner of the cemetery west of Woodbury's Plain. This was a long way off for the residents west of Blackwater, and the question of a new meeting-house was agitated in 1784, but without result. In 1791 they presented the following petition to the General Court:

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire in General Court Assembled:

"The subscribers, inhabitants of the westerly half of the town of Boscawen, in said state, humbly beg leave to show that the easterly half of said Town was first settled, & that the meeting-house built to accommodate that part of the town only, giving the westerly part, which was then thinly inhabited, encouragement for a parish, when their numbers were sufficient, but as it is not agreeable to the laws of the state, your petitioners are exposed to great inconvenience and hardship in attending public worship, town meetings & especially in the winter season, it being more than five miles from the Meeting-house to the Centre of the westerly half of said Town & that from the combination of Ponds Hills & Swamps &c., which lie between the easterly & westerly half, will ever render it inconvenient to remain in our District & in our present situation we have no redress without the aid of this court.

"Your petitioners, therefore, pray that the westerly half of said Town may be set off from the easterly half, and incorporated into a separate Town by the name of Bristol, with the same privileges as other Towns in this state or otherwise relieved, as your Honors, in your wisdom, shall see meet, & your petitioners, as in Duty bound, shall ever pray.

"Boscawen, June 1, 1791."

This was signed by seventy-one names,—that is, by all the legal voters west of Beaver Dam. This alarmed the citizens of the east section, who did not wish the town divided, and, at a special town-meeting, a committee of non-residents was chosen to select a site for a new meeting-house. One of this committee was Judge Ebenezer Webster, of Salisbury, father of Hon. Daniel Webster. It was voted that the frame be raised and the pews sold during the year. This building is now the town-house of Webster.

In 1793 the first store was opened in Webster by Samuel Gookin, in a house that stood on the site now occupied by the residence of George Little, Esq., on Corser Hill.

"In 1812, Colonel John Farmer, Abraham Burlbank, Moses Gerrish, William Danforth, Moses Tyler, of Hopkinton, Little Burlbank, Moses Little and other citizens, formed an association known as the Bashan Mining Co. It was thought that lead and silver would be found on land owned by William Danforth. Extravagant stories were current in regard to lead mines known to the Indians. It was currently reported that the Indians knew a place where they could cut out the lead with their knives, and thus obtain bullets. If the citizens had known ought of mineralogy, they would have rejected such fictions at once, for lead never exists, in its native state, in such a form.

"The first meeting of the association was at the house of Abraham Burlbank, October 27, 1812. Moses Gerrish was chosen moderator and John Farmer clerk.

"At a second meeting it was Voted that John Holmes shall have a share in said mine, providing that he will show the company where the real substance of lead is, and not without." Voted, that application be made to Israel Diamond, of Godstown, for the discovery of the mine, if Holmes should fail. Voted, that application be made to Dr. For Withis [Withem], of Plymouth, if Holmes and Diamond should fail.

"These gentlemen—Holmes, Diamond and Withem—were supposed to be able to locate a mine by the use of witch-hazel rods, which, when carried in the hand, would point to the precious metal.

"Which of these located the mine is not known, but operations began near William Danforth's house. A hole thirty or forty feet deep was dug, but no silver or lead was found, and the mine was soon abandoned."

In February, 1824, and August, 1826, great freshets occurred, the latter having been known ever since as "the great August freshet." More than twelve inches of rain fell in six hours. "Every bridge across the Blackwater was swept away with the exception of that at Sweatt's Mills. The water ran through the ravines west of the village at Sweatt's Mills and also took the short cut from the bend near the residence of Mr. Orlando Fittz to the mills near Samuel Little's. The roads were very much washed. The damage in other towns was equally great. At the White Mountains occurred the slide by which the Willey family lost their lives."

A post-office was established at Sweatt's Mills in 1830 and the mail was carried once a week to Hopkinton. Most of the citizens, however, received their mail from Concord, and, in 1841, a petition was entered for a new post-route to Boscawen, with a mail service twice a week, which was granted. In 1851 a tri-weekly mail was obtained, and since 1881 the mail has been delivered daily.

The Granite Mutual Fire Insurance Company was organized in 1841. S. B. Little was president, and Rev. Ebenezer Price secretary. This association gave place, in 1877, to the Merrimack County Mutual Fire Insurance Company, with the following directors: Francis B. Sawyer, president; Friend L. Burlbank, Joseph L. Couch, Cyrus Fittz, Ephraim Little secretary and treasurer.

Incorporation.—In 1791, as has already been seen, the people of West Boscawen petitioned for a division of the town, that they might secure a meeting-house for themselves. This was, however, prevented by the citizens of the east part of the town, who agreed to the building of the desired place of worship. In course of time other causes conspired to bring about a permanent separation between the two sections. The Northern and Concord and Claremont Railroads had changed the currents of trade to Concord, Warner and Contoocook instead of Boscawen Plain, as formerly. The lack of a central town-house furnished another reason for discontent. Town-meetings had been held at the east and west ends of the town alternately; but, in 1840, the meeting-house on the Plain being remodeled, the meeting was at West Boscawen two years in succession, and this raised the question of division again. Some of the voters at the west end complained of unfair dealing in the application of public funds, being aggrieved by the purchase of a fire-engine for Fisherville (now Penacook), which, they affirmed, had been voted upon after the majority had gone home. On the other hand, taxable property at the east end was rapidly increasing, and the citizens of that section retorted that they had heavy taxes of their own to pay without being obliged to keep so many Blackwater bridges in repair. Political jealousies naturally arose between the two parts of the town, and at length, in 1860, the centennial year of the town of Boscawen, a petition was presented to the Legislature, signed almost entirely by the citizens of the east part of the town (but one name having been obtained from the other part), praying that the town might be divided, the east section retaining the name and records. This roused strong and indignant feelings among the people of West Boscawen. In spite of all causes of discontent, they were proud of the past history of the noble old town, and were unwilling to be thus thrust out from their inheritance in its name and fame. They opposed the division stoutly; but stronger influences were brought to bear upon the legislative body by the other side, and on July 4, 1860, the Governor approved the act of incorporation, the first section of which, defining the boundaries of the new town, is as follows:

"That all that part of the town of Boscawen lying westward of the following described line, to wit: beginning at the centre of Beaver-Dam Brook, so called, on the northerly boundary line of said town, and running thence southerly along the centre of said brook to Couch Pond, so called; thence in a straight line across said pond to the brook connecting the same with Great Pond, so called; thence along the centre of said last-mentioned brook to said Great Pond; thence in a straight line across said Great Pond and the brook running therefrom, at the southerly end thereof; thence along the centre of said brook until it strikes the southerly side of the highway, near Burbank's Mills, so called, leading from Ephraim Plumer's to Dodge's Mills, so called; thence easterly, along the southerly side of said highway to a point in a line with the westerly side-line of the fifth range of the forty-five acre lots in the fourth division, as originally laid out; thence southerly to and along said westerly line of said fifth range, and in continuation of the same thence to, to the southerly boundary line of said Boscawen, be, and the same line is severed from said town and made a body politic and corporate, by the name of Webster."

Great dissatisfaction was felt in regard to the name. It was claimed that it had been given in honor of Daniel Webster; but the people of the town believed it to have been given out of "malice prepense" as a lasting sarcasm upon the relations of certain men prominent in both towns. Moreover, they claimed that, even if given in good faith and in honor of the great statesman, it was the east end, where he had engaged in the practice of law from March, 1805, until September, 1807, which should have the name, rather than the west, with which he had no connection whatever. They petitioned the Legislature for the name West Boscawen, but were refused. This, however, was retained as the post-office address until a later period, and the name of Webster was rarely used, save in legal matters.

Probably the true explanation of the origin of the name is to be found in the following extract from a letter written by Judge Smith, of Manchester, in reply to inquiries addressed to him by Sherman Little, Esq.:

"The bill to divide the town was reported favorably by some committee, probably by the committee on division of towns. The bill, as reported, gave the new town the name of West Boscawen. I knew nothing about the merits of the bill, or of the feeling that had arisen between the people of the east and west parts of the old town. When the bill was reported and read, it occurred to me that it would be in better taste, as well as more convenient, to give the new town a distinctive name, rather than a name not differing from that of the old town, except by the geographical prefix. Accordingly, I cast my eye over a township map of New England in search of an appropriate name. Almost the first name that caught my attention was Webster. It immediately occurred to me that it would be peculiarly appropriate to name one of the towns Webster, for that distinguished son of New Hampshire, Daniel Webster. . . . I at once suggested the matter to the counsel who represented the old and new towns, and they both assented that I might make the motion to amend the bill in the particular mentioned, or make no objection to it. . . .

"When the bill next came up in the House, I moved to amend by striking out the words West Boscawen, wherever they occurred, and inserting the word Webster, and stated briefly my reasons for so doing. . . . My recollection is that no one said a word against the change of name, and the motion was adopted without discussion or opposition."

The first town meeting was held August 11th, S. B. Little, Esq., being elected moderator, and D. E. Burbank town clerk.

It was expected that the new town would return a Democratic majority, but, in its first town-meeting and ever since, Republican principles have prevailed. In 1866, fifteen ballotings for representative resulted in no choice, and the town was unrepresented for that year.

Before the first year of the incorporate existence of Webster had passed, the cloud of Civil War, which had been slowly gathering over the land, burst in all its fury. There was a diversity of feeling among the inhabitants of the town, some believing the war to be unnecessary, a few sympathizing openly with the South, while the larger part were ready, with heart, hand and purse, to sustain the administration in its efforts to put down rebellion.

January 15, 1862, it was voted to support the families of those who had enlisted, and the selectmen were authorized to raise money for that purpose.

August 7th, "Voted, that the town pay one hundred dollars to each recruit who is an inhabitant of this town, who will enlist before the 15th of the present month, for the term of three years, not to exceed the quota required of this town, to be paid when mustered into the service." "Voted, that the selectmen be authorized to hire a sum not exceeding three thousand dollars, to meet the expense of paying the above bounty to volunteers."

September 3d, "Voted, that the town pay to volunteers for nine months in the army of the United States one hundred dollars each, upon their being mustered into the service of the United States, and the selectmen are empowered to hire money sufficient to pay the same.

January 7, 1863, "Voted, that the selectmen procure men to fill the town's quota on the best terms they can, and pay from any money belonging to the town not otherwise appropriated."

September 7th, "Resolved, that the town of Webster pay to its drafted men, and all those that may be drafted, or their substitutes, the sum of three hundred dollars, in accordance with an act of Legislature passed June session, 1863, and approved July 19, 1863."

March 8, 1864, "Voted, that a bounty of three hundred dollars be paid to its veteran volunteers, who have or may re-enlist to the credit of the town, and authorize the selectmen to raise the sum."

August 16, 1877, the ninety-ninth anniversary of the battle of Bennington was celebrated in the Congregational meeting-house with appropriate exercises. Sherman Little, Esq., was president of the day. A historical oration was delivered by C. C. Coffin, Esq., of Boston. This was followed by addresses by Rev. Edward Buxton, Rev. Arthur Little, of Fond du Lac, Wis., and others, with music by a select quartette and an original song by Major Alfred Little.

November 7th, the State having voted a convention for the revision of the Constitution, Rev. Edward Buxton was chosen delegate from Webster.

August 16, 1883, the town of Boseawen celebrated the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its settlement, and proposed to Webster, as having been formerly a part of its territory, to unite in the celebration and preparations therefor. The town in its official capacity did not respond to the invitation; but the sum of $50.50 was contributed by individuals towards the expenses of the occasion, and Webster ladies, with their usual liberality and housewifely skill, furnished generous baskets of provisions for the tables.

CHAPTER II.

WEBSTER—(Continued).

Military History—Ecclesiastical History—Educational History.

Military History.—The history of the Revolution has been written over and over again. Some writers have wearied themselves and their readers with their careful detail of the causes that led to the glorious struggle. Others have lavished their powers of description upon the brilliant battle-scenes of the war, while others still have devoted their pens to the character and achievements of their favorite heroes. But a large part of that history can never be written by human pen. The struggles between love and patriotism, the hand-to-hand fights with poverty, the heroism that nerved the hearts of wives and mothers to bid God-speed to their husbands and sons, and then turn back without flinching into their lonely homes to do as best they could the work that belonged to stronger hands—these can be found only in the records kept above. Webster has her full share in this unwritten history, though there may be little which can be put upon paper. Her adult citizens in 1776 were not more than thirty in number, but these all signed the Articles of Association, by which they did "solemnly engage and promise that we will, to the utmost in our Power, at the Risque of our Lives and Fortunes, with Arms, oppose the Hostile Proceedings of the British Fleets and Armies against the United Colonies." "This was the people's Declaration of Independence, agreed to before the signing of that document by the Continental Congress on July 4th. They put their names boldly to the paper, thereby declaring themselves rebels." Such men were not slow to answer their country's call to active service. They were found at Bunker Hill and on the field of Bennington, undaunted by perils, not shrinking from hardship, always proving themselves sturdy patriots.

The military spirit seems to have been active in Webster even after the emergencies of war had passed by. Two companies of the volunteer militia of Boseawen, the Light Infantry and the Rifle Company, were formed almost entirely of men residing in the westerly part of the town. Both these companies were well organized, well officered and well drilled.

The breaking out of the Rebellion, in 1861, roused the citizens of the newly-formed town to a higher appreciation than ever of the "Union one and indivisible." The following is the list of soldiers from Webster as given in Mr. Coffin's history and drawn from the papers in the town-clerk's office and from the reports of the adjutant-general, neither of them giving in full the company and regiment:

Calvin M. Burbank, enlisted in Company B, Second Regiment.
Lieutenant David E. Burbank, enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Regiment.
Ezekiel W. Burbank, enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Regiment.
Carter F. Blanchard, enlisted in Company E, Tenth Regiment.

George Cull, enlisted in Fourteenth Regiment.

 Blaisdell Sweet, enlisted in Company H, Fourth Regiment.
 Lieutenant Frederic P. Stone, enlisted in Cavalry.
 Jefferson Searles, enlisted in Seventh Regiment.
 Joseph O. Sanborn, enlisted in Fourth Regiment.
 Joseph E. Sanders, enlisted in Company E, Sharpshooters.
 Lieutenant Walter H. Sargent, enlisted in Company H, Fourteenth Regiment.
 Isaac P. Sargent, enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Regiment.
 John Sargent, enlisted in Heavy Artillery.
 Warren A. Story, enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Regiment.
 Hiram Thompson, enlisted in Fourteenth Regiment.
 Luther C. Titcomb, enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Regiment.
 Joseph Thurber, enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Regiment.
 John Whittier.
 David J. Whittier, enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Regiment.

These did their duty nobly. Some fell on the field of battle, others were slain by the malarious atmosphere of the South, and some of those who came home bore honorable scars.

The Webster enrollment is given as follows:

Ecclesiastical History.—The "old meeting-house" stands on Long Street, not far from the Blackwater, keeping guard over the "old graveyard," where two whole generations lie buried. The house was built in 1791, but the burial-ground was not laid out until 1813. This was the first meeting-house built in Webster, and was occupied as a place of worship by the Congregational denomination until the erection of the meeting-house on Corser Hill, in 1823. In 1804 the "Westerly Religious Society" was formed, composed of seventy members, including the citizens west of Beaver Dam, together with some from Water Street, in Boscawen. The society was incorporated in 1810. The "Second Congregational Church in Boscawen" was organized September 26, 1804, and at the same time Rev. Ebenezer Price was installed as its pastor. He continued in the sacred office until 1837, when he was dismissed by mutual consent, and Rev. Edward Buxton was installed as pastor December 13, 1837. With the exception of a few months in 1875-76, when the church was served by Rev. William Schofield, he was in active service until 1882, when Rev. Charles E. Gordon began his labors as stated supply. In October, 1883, he was installed as pastor, "Father Buxton" being at the same time dismissed. For a period of seventy-nine years this church had had but two pastors, a record which is seldom surpassed.

Deacons have been elected as follows: Benjamin Sweet, Eliphalet Kilburn, 1805; Enoch Little, 1811; James Kilburn, 1825; George T. Pillsbury, 1831; Jeremiah Gerrish, 1836; Enoch Little, Eldad Austin, 1843; Henry Gerrish, Henry Pearson, 1874. Since the formation of the church, four hundred and thirty-four members have been added to its fellowship,—one hundred and seventy-five males and two hundred and fifty-nine females; sixty-five of these were received by letter; four hundred and ninety-nine children and one hundred and six adults have been baptized. The name of the church was changed, December 29, 1868, from "The Second Congregational Church in Boscawen" to "The First Congregational Church in Webster."

The forty-fifth anniversary of Father Buxton's settlement over the church was celebrated December 13, 1882. Invitations were sent, as far as possible, to all who had ever been members of the church. The day proved unpropitious, one of the heaviest snow-storms of the year filling the sky; but the meeting-house was filled with a happy throng of friends, old and new. There were beautiful decorations of ever-green, while on the pulpit and platform bouquets and flowering plants were tastefully arranged. The venerable pastor gave a retrospective address, recalling briefly and vividly the circumstances of his installation and the men who took part in it, all of whom had now finished their earthly labors. C. C. Coffin, Esq., of Boston, a former member of the church, then gave a historical address, throwing the strong light of his graphic style over the manners and customs of the olden time. Rev. J. H. Hoffman, of Hemiker, N. H., spoke in behalf of the pastors of neighboring churches. A purse of three hundred dollars was presented to Father Buxton by Deacon H. H. Gerrish, in behalf of his friends. After a generous supper, served in the gallery, which has been fitted up as a "social-room," the evening was spent in listening to letters from absent friends and in social converse, interspersed with music. Poems written by Mrs. James B. Goodhue and by Mr. Luther B. Little were read. Another, written by Miss Getchell, of Newburyport, was received too late for reading, and was inserted in the pamphlet containing the published account of the day. The occasion was declared by all who participated to be a rare success.

In 1820 the "Christian Union Society" was formed, the reasons for which are thus stated in the preamble to the constitution,—

"We are, Religion and morality, grounded on Evangelical principles, by the truest foundation for happiness here and hereafter, and in order to meditate and support this grand principle, it becomes necessary that men associate together and form themselves into societies for the mutual support and happiness of each other; and such is the lot of human nature in this imperfect state that it becomes necessary for every society to form and adopt certain rules of government for the mutual happiness of the whole; Therefore, with these views and impressions, we, the subscribers, agree to form ourselves into a society under the above preamble."

The society was composed of fifty members.

They voted, in the next year, to lay claim to "their privilege in the West meeting-house" and also their equal share of the parsonage money. They believed this to be legal from the fact that the town had erected the frame of the house and had sold the pews for raising money to finish it. Some of the members of the society were pew-owners and the rest held that, on the ground of citizenship, they had a right to a share in the house. Various negotiations passed between the two societies, but without reaching any settlement, until at last the Christian Union Society "Resolved to occupy the house." "This was done June 15th and 16th, in connection with a session of the Christian General Conference. The Christian Union Society took possession of the meeting-house at an early hour on Sunday morning, and Elder Peter Young was occupying the pulpit when Rev. Mr. Price entered the house at the usual hour for public service. The assessors of the Westery Religious Society made a formal demand for the house. There was some confusion, but no breach of the peace. The time had gone by for a compromise between the two societies, and the Westery Religious Society resolved to erect a meeting-house for themselves, thus leaving the Union Society in undisturbed and peaceable possession of the old house."

"In 1844 the Christian Union Society voted to remodel the meeting-house—flooding over the galleries, removing the east and west porches and making a convenient chapel of the upper story, the lower floor being reserved for a town-house. All the slips—fifty-two in number—with the exception of two, were sold."

The society was vigorous and flourishing for several years; but emigration thinned its membership and since 1869 no regular service has been held.

The Christian Baptist Church was formed in 1808, consisting of five male and seven female members. It was organized June 16th under the following compact:

"These churches have agreed to lay aside all the party names by which professors are called, with all such titles as are called creeds, covenants, platforms and articles of faith, with all the commandments of men, and to consider Christ their only Master and the New Testament their only rule, and to be known by the name given at Antioch—which is Christian."

At the close of the year 1808 the church numbered twenty-five members. It is now virtually extinct.

The Methodist Church of Webster was formed in 1839, having its place of worship at Sweat's Mills. At that time the Methodist Biblical Institute was at Concord and the church was supplied by its students. At a subsequent period, the institute was removed from Concord, and, as a result, preaching has not been regularly sustained.

Sabbath-schools have been maintained in Webster more than sixty years. At first they were held in the different districts, in the school-houses or at private residences. In 1824 the number of scholars was ninety-seven; these recited twenty-nine thousand nine hundred and fifty-seven verses of Scripture during the six months ending October 24th. Mr. Coffin tells of "one scholar of retentive memory, who tired out the patience of his teacher, reciting chapter after chapter, and was told that he might finish the recitation on the next Sunday."

In 1831 the schools were organized into one, and the sessions held on Sabbath noon at the meeting-house. Sabbath-schools are at present maintained by both Methodist and Congregational Churches, including all ages.

Educational History.—No picture of New England life is considered complete without its church and school-house. These are not always found in close proximity, it is true; nevertheless, religion and education lay very near the hearts of the early settlers. To be sure, they sometimes lost sight of the distinction between religion and theology, and were more zealous for orthodoxy than for holy living; and we, in the late afternoon of the nineteenth century, smile at their narrow views of education. But the church of to-day owes them sincere gratitude for their staunch adherence to the principles of the Bible; and many a man among the mature scholars of the present age looks back with a wholesome respect to the humble school-house and the stern school-master with whom his childhood had an acquaintance, feelingly remembered, even now. The sum total of information which those ancient schools afforded was very small, and their appliances for education and mental culture were exceedingly few; but they kept alive and stimulated a love of learning, and, by their very deficiencies, prepared the way for better things.

In 1787, if we could have looked into the southwest corner room of the house in Webster now occupied by Mrs. S. B. Little, we should have found forty or fifty large boys and girls assembled for school. The seats are benches of plank without backs. The only window is a half-sash of six lights. The teacher is Enoch Little, a young man of shrewd common sense and ready mother-wit, both of which stand him in good stead in the possible emergencies which may arise out of his uncouth surroundings. He is, perhaps, as fond of argument and as decided in his opinions as when, sixty years later, he used to settle, with calm authority and to his own entire satisfaction, the interpretation of prophecy. He has a turbulent set to deal with, but he is master of the situation and impresses upon his pupils, from his own personality, lessons far more valuable than the reading, writing and arithmetic which they receive.

Another man, famous among the schools of the olden time, was Moses Thurston, then and through his long life known as "Master Thurston."

"He was a severe disciplinarian. One of his instruments for maintaining discipline was a leather ferule, composed of two pieces of hammered sole-leather, with sheet lead stitched between them. On one side he punched four holes, on the other, five. He usually asked a culprit which he would have—four holes or five. If the trembling victim said four, Master Thurston usually gave this reply: 'For fear of making a mistake, I will give you both.' Each stroke left an array of blisters the size of the holes, on the aching palm. He taught several years in West Salisbury. It was a turbulent school, and it used to be jocosely said that the surrounding farms never would have been cleared of ablers if Master Thurston had not been employed as teacher."

The writer's most vivid recollection of him is as he sat in church in a pew at the north end of the gallery, on the east side of the meeting-house on Corser Hill. He always sat in the same seat, in the same position, looking down from his serene height upon the minister, attentive, but otherwise apparently unmoved by pathos or eloquence. He was a regular attendant until advancing years rendered him too infirm. He died in 1861, aged eighty-eight years.

The first "school-dame" whose name appears on the records of Webster was Phebe Knight, who kept school on Little Hill in 1791, and afterwards on White Plain. We find no further record of her as a teacher; but she was a poetess as well, and perhaps some of her instructions to her pupils were softened and blended into rhymes. The following fragment might well cheat a boy into learning a good lesson without knowing it:

"A FRAGMENT.

"The Pen.

"How great is my use!" cries the quill of a pen—
'Who duly my merits appraise—
My praises resound the world all around—
I make even fools to be wise."

"The Needle.

"Hold! hold! prating goose, for I'm of most use,
Although I am shorter and slimmer—
By my little head many thousands are fed, Whilst your scribble won't purchase a dinner."

"The Wheel.

"And what were your head were it not for my thread—
So, then, independent Miss Steel,
Just acknowledge thy due to the wheel."

"The Loom.

"And what were your worth were it not for my cloth
The loom, looking largely, replied,
'Both needle and thread might beg for their bread
If I did not keep them employed."

"The Axe.

"Mr. Axe raised his head and to them he said—
'Come, yield the precedence to me,
For to me, you must know, you're being your own,
For I hewed you out of the tree."

"In this dispute among the tools—

We see how much we look like to be,
When pulp to give to swiftness,
And makes us get out our own eyes
Shall human tools contend with God,
And boast as if they were no wood?
We are, the clay, formed by His hand
For His own use, at His command,
Let not our proud our hearts deceive,
For what have we we've not received."

Miss Knight was afterwards married to Mr. Nicholas Moody, and lived to a good old age. The mantle of the teacher and poetess has fallen upon her granddaughter, Miss Ellen K. Abbot, who was for a long time a very successful teacher among the schools of Webster, and for some years a member of the superintending committee, and whose pen runs naturally to rhymes.

Mary and Phebe Thurston, sisters of Moses, were also among the schoolma'ams of early days. The former taught on Little Hill in 1792 and 1793. She was married afterwards to Mr. Ephraim Noyes, but kept school in her own house, the same now occupied by her daughter, Miss Edna Noyes. Miss Noyes remembers that on one occasion her mother saw fit to correct a girl in school, but administered chastisement lightly. The mother of the child was weeping in the "shed-room," and apprehensive that Mrs. Noyes was not severe enough, she appeared upon the scene and proceeded to carry out Solomon's precept, "Withold not thou correction—spare not for his crying." The teacher's authority was vindicated, nor was it disputed again by that child. Truly, parental good sense was not unknown in those days.

Phebe Thurston continued teaching until the demand for "higher education" left her modest attainments in the back-ground. She was a woman of natural dignity of manner and of firm will. On being asked what wages she used to receive in school, she answered, "Seventy-five cents a week and boarded round." She died in 1867, at the ripe age of eighty-nine years.

The list of studies in those days was very brief, for books were few. The Bible and Catechism were diligently studied, and the girls carried their sewing and knitting to school, in which important branches of domestic economy the teacher, if a woman, was expected to be proficient. The grand problem of education is not yet fully solved, even by the school system of our own country, of which we are justly so proud. Between the limited curriculum and bare practicality of the schools at the opening of this century and the extended courses of study and infinite amount of general information about everything which scholars of the present are expected to absorb there is a golden mean, which, perhaps, will be found to be nearer a true solution of the problem than either extreme.

In 1809 a new school law was passed. The districts were re-established and a superintending committee appointed, consisting of Rev. Ebenezer Price,

Rev. Samuel Wood and the selectmen. It must be remembered that this committee supervised the whole town of Bascom, including Webster. Rev. Mr. Price took a lively interest in all the educational affairs of the town, and his influence was deeply and widely felt among teachers and pupils. From this time there was a marked improvement in the schools. It was found that strength of nerve and muscle was not the only qualification needful for the teacher, and the absolute despotism of the ferule passed away.

The committee voted to visit the schools "the second Tuesday after their commencement and the Tuesday preceding their close, and to this end public notice shall be given the Sabbath before such visit."

The following is Mr. Price's report of the first visitation of the committee under the new law:

"1860, May 16, No. 1.—Tuesday A. M. committee, according to public notice, visited the school district No. 6, Little Hill, under the care of Miss Mary Gerrish,—32 children. Books, Spelling book, Precceptor, Geography, Grammar, Bible & Catechism.

"May 20, No. 7.—Tuesday A. M. visited School at White Plain under the care of Miss Sally Pillsbury,—25 children. Books, Spelling book, Testament & Catechism. The scholars young, but ambitious and very observant of order.

"No. 3.—Same day A. M. visited School on Corser Hill under the care of Miss Phoebe Thurston—50 children, 25 girls. Books, Columbian Orator, Geography, Testament, Catechism. Some writers, but none in grammar.

"June 13, No. 9.—Visited Long Pond School, under the care of Miss Mary Parker,—37 children. Books, Spelling B., one in Webster's 3d P. & one in the Bible. No Grammar, Geog'y or Catechism, or writers. A pleasant number of scholars who have been under the disadvantages of poor instructors, a miserable government & want of books.

"Same day, viz., No. 8.—Visited Basham School, under the care of Miss Abigail Allen,—33 children. Books, Spelling B., Webster's 3d P. & Catechism. None in Grammar, Geog'y or writing; the School well-governed & the children ambitious.

"We found in the several schools 268 children, as yet not accommodated with suitable school-books; but generally well provided with capable instructors & under that order & tuition which promises much advantage to the children & great satisfaction to their Parents, & at once shows a very wise appropriation of property for the education of children under the sanction of law.

"Edw. Price,

"Scribe."

In this report of summer schools, arithmetic does not appear in the list of text-books. "Mental arithmetic was not introduced until about 1830. Its introduction produced great excitement. Many of the parents opposed it on the ground that it would confuse the minds of the children and produce insanity."

Reports of two of the winter schools will be subjoined, and then we will pass on to a later period,— "Jan. 15, No. 3.—Visited School Corser Hill,—61 children 29 girls, 41 boys. Benjamin Goodkin, Master.

1st Class	15 in Geog.
2d "	6 in Webster 1 P.
3d "	12 in Precceptor
4th "	4 in Testament
5th "	11 in Spelling, 4 Syl. well
6th "	3 in 1 syllables
	4 in 2 syllables
	2 in letters

"29 writers, 19 in arithmetic & 4 in Grammar. School well arranged & governed.

"Feb. 11th, No. 6.—Visited School Little Hill,—52 Schol. Well arranged in a new and commodious school-house, under the care of Mr. South.

1 class	3 in 2 syllables
2 "	4 in 3 "
3 "	4 in Poetical lessons, Spell. B. well
4 "	10 in Precceptor
5 "	4 in English Reader, well
6 "	27 in Geog.; some too fast, others slow
	17 parsed grammar.
	33 Spelt in Dicty.—Girls better than boys—
	4 in Arithmetic.
	26 in writing.

"This School promises fair."

For many years Rev. Edward Buxton was a member of the superintending committee of the town and labored indefatigably for the improvement of the schools. He did much to secure a uniformity of text-books throughout the town. Under the direction of Mr. Price, select schools had been kept on Corser Hill, taught by students from Dartmouth College. Mr. Buxton revived this practice, and for a long series of years a flourishing school was held every autumn. These schools did not a little toward raising the standard of attainments among the scholars of Webster, putting within reach of many, advantages which otherwise they could not have enjoyed.

In many, if not all, of the districts of the town, some weeks of private school are often added to the term of public instruction. Some of the districts show their appreciation of a good teacher by securing the same one for several terms in succession.

In 1867 the town voted to raise one hundred and fifty dollars, in addition to the amount required by law, for educational purposes.

A word is due in this connection to the musical culture of Webster. Deacon Enoch Little taught the first singing-school not far from the beginning of this century, in the house now owned by Henry L. Dodge. He said of himself, "I knew but little about music, but I guess I knew more at that time than any other man in town." He was leader of the choir, which numbered about sixty persons. His son Enoch was afterwards a successful teacher and leader.

Twenty-five or thirty years ago Webster numbered among its musicians many of rare excellence and sweetness of voice. Notable among these were Mrs. F. B. Sawyer, Mrs. George Little, Mrs. Moses Truscott, E. W. Burbank, all of whom have joined the choir above. Others who have taken deep interest in music, or have been teachers of singing-schools, are J. P. Farmer, now of Glyndon, Minn.; D. E. Burbank, now of Norwich, Vt.; C. C. Coffin, Esq., of Boston; J. L. Gerrish, H. F. Pearson, J. B. Chase and Mrs. H. H. Gerrish.

WEBSTER—(Continued).

Biographical—List of Town Officers from 1860 to 1885.

Biographical.—The following biographical sketches are prepared, to a great extent, from Mr. Coffin's history, with his permission.

ABRAHAM BURBANK, eldest son of David Burbank, and grandson of Captain Moses Burbank, one of the early settlers of Boscawen, was one of the prominent business men of Webster. He was born November 16, 1781; learned the trade of blacksmith of his father, and carried on blacksmithing with Jesse Little, on Little Hill. He was an adept in making axes, giving them a shape much liked by the wood-choppers at the beginning of the century, and of such keen temper that "Abe Burbank's axes" were widely known and had a ready sale.

With his son, Friend L. Burbank, he became proprietor of the mills on Blackwater River, of a mill on Knight's Meadow Brook and of one on Pond Brook. At one time nearly every mill in Boscawen was employed in sawing his lumber, which was sent down the Merrimack River to Lowell and Boston. He was greatly respected by his fellow-citizens and was repeatedly elected to represent them in the Legislature. He was a cheerful supporter of religious and charitable organizations, and alive to all interests affecting the public welfare. He died in 1836, aged seventy-five years, an active, energetic, honored citizen to the last year of his life.

REV. EDWARD BUXTON, the youngest son of Captain Benjamin and Hannah (Flint) Buxton, was born in New Boston, N. H., August 17, 1803. His early educational advantages were very limited. The district school, a little study of Latin with his beloved old pastor, Rev. E. P. Bradford, a term at Frances-town Academy, another at Exeter (Phillips) Academy comprised the whole of his opportunities of school. But up to the very end of his long life he was a close student. He was a good Greek and Latin scholar, and late in life he engaged with much zest in the study of Hebrew. A young lady who was visiting in his family, on going into his study one Monday morning, found him seated at his table with pencil and paper before him, deeply engaged in study. He said he was trying to see if he could construct a table of logarithms if he had none to refer to, and that he thought he could do it. He added, half apologetically, that he allowed himself to be idle on Monday and to indulge in recreation a little after the labors of the Sabbath. She declared she was afraid of a man who found his recreation in the construction of logarithmic tables.

His father said of him, in his early childhood: "Edward must be my minister;" but a habit of stammering developed itself, which was greatly aggravated by a fright received in early life; and though he himself desired to carry out his father's wish, the impediment in his speech seemed to interpose an insuperable obstacle. He turned his attention to the study of medicine; but a severe illness cut short his studies just before the completion of his last course of lectures. About this time he fell in with Barber's "Grammar of Elocution," which gave him valuable hints in regard to the training of the voice, and he became convinced that he could, in time, entirely overcome his impediment. He succeeded so fully that, in later life, he was remarkable for his clear enunciation and for perfect control of his voice.

He took charge of the academy in Greenland, N. H., when he read and talked theology with his friend, Rev. Samuel Wallace Clark, pastor of the Congregational Church in that place. He assisted in pastoral duties, and, in the absence of the pastor, conducted Sabbath services. He was sometimes called to supply vacant pulpits in adjoining towns, and, almost unconsciously, found himself performing ministerial duties. In 1836 he was ordained as an evangelist, and preached in Rochester, N. H., and afterwards in Lancaster, Dalton and Whitefield. In 1837 he received a call from the church in Webster, and was installed December 13th of that year. The celebration of the forty-fifth anniversary of his installation occurred December 13, 1882. At this time he ceased from active pastoral duty, but was not dismissed until the installment of his successor, Rev. C. E. Gordon, October 4, 1883. He died May 27, 1885, aged eighty-one years.

Mr. Buxton was a man of singular simplicity and sincerity of character, of uniform kindness of heart and of ready sympathy. The testimony of those who knew him best was that he lived habitually above the world. He was a faithful pastor, thoroughly devoted to his work, patient and self-denying in labor, availing himself of all means in his power for doing good. His sermons combined the doctrinal and practical elements, and were clear and forcible in style, with but little of mere rhetorical ornament.

He watched over the schools of the town with a fatherly solicitude, and, when he was superintending committee, knew the name of every child in town. In the earlier years of his pastorate many of the young people of the town were, at different times, members of his family and under his private tuition.

He inherited from his mother a love for music, amounting almost to a passion, which continued till his death. When he was a young man he played the violin; but, after entering the ministry, he laid it aside, fearing it might lessen his chances of usefulness. In his old age he took it up again, playing with much skill, but confining himself almost exclusively to sacred music. When flesh and heart began to fail under the pressure of disease, he often resorted to his violin, for the sake of the spiritual stimulus which it afforded him; for, in his hands, it was a sacred instrument, and his spirit, perhaps unconsciously to himself, plumed her wings for a heavenward flight as he played.

A letter read on the occasion of his forty-fifth anniversary, speaks of him on this wise:

"The more I reflect on the history of his life, so far as I know it, the more I feel that he has been, in many ways, a remarkable man. His purity of motive, his loftiness of purpose, his singleness of aim, his patient persistence in striving against obstacles, his constant determination to make the most of himself in body and soul, and his consequent scholarly attainments, all the result of his own unaided efforts, these things reveal a nature of more than ordinary firmness and evenness of fibre."

Mr. Buxton was married, first, June 12, 1838, to Miss Elizabeth McFarland, of Concord, who died September 11, 1842; second, September 27, 1843, to Miss Lois Jewett, of Gilford, who died November 20, 1870; third, December 29, 1871, to Mrs. Louisa F. Pillsbury, of Londonderry (formerly of Webster), who survives him.

CHARLES CARLETON COFFIN was born in Boscawen July 26, 1823, and was the youngest child of Thomas and Hannah (Kilburn) Coffin. His education, beyond the advantages of the district school, was obtained at the academy on Boscawen Plain and at the Blanchard Academy, Pembroke, N. H., where he remained only one term. But he was a lover of books, and read all that came in his way. In the westerly part of the town (now Webster) was a circulating library of one hundred and fifty well-worn volumes, gathered about 1816. Among these were sundry books of history and travels, which the boy devoured eagerly and which may have had no small part in giving direction to his literary tastes and labors in after-years. His great ambition was to go to college, but ill health rendered this impracticable. During the winter of 1842, more for pastime than from any plan for the future, he studied land surveying and the rudiments of civil engineering. He afterwards joined the engineers' corps in the preliminary survey of the Northern Railroad in 1845, and was employed upon its construction in 1846; also in the preliminary survey of the Concord and Portsmouth road, and later on the Concord and Claremont.

He was married, February 18, 1846, to Miss Sallie R. Farmer, of Webster, sister of Professor M. G. Farmer. He purchased a farm in Webster, but his health failed and he decided to turn to other pursuits. In 1849 he constructed a telegraph line between Harvard Observatory and Boston, by which uniform time was given to railroads leading out of Boston. In 1851 he had charge of the construction of the telegraphic fire-alarm in Boston, under the care of Professor Farmer, and gave the first alarm ever given by that system April 29, 1852.

Before that time his fugitive contributions to the newspapers of the day had been received with much favor, and some of them had been republished in "Littell's Living Age." His tastes led him towards journalism. From 1851 to 1860 he was employed on several of the newspapers in Boston,—the Journal, Atlas, Traveler, Ice and Transcript, and during the winter of 1860-61 was night editor of the Journal. The Southern States were then seceding; the Peace Congress was in session, and Mr. Coffin saw, what all men did not see, that a conflict of arms was approaching. He was then a resident of Malden, and the morning after the surrender of Sumter took measures for the calling of a public meeting of the citizens of that town to sustain the President,—one of the first of the meetings held throughout the country. Upon the breaking out of the war Mr. Coffin became a correspondent of the Journal, writing over the signature of "Carleton."

During the entire war he was an indefatigable correspondent, ever on the alert, noted for his promptness and for his lively narrative, and for his vivid description of the scenery of war. During the twelve days of the Gettysburg campaign he rode between two hundred and fifty and three hundred miles in the saddle, nine hundred miles in the cars, was on the battle-field three days and nights, and wrote a full and elaborate account, which was republished in many papers throughout the country, and translated and copied by the press of Berlin and Paris. When General Sherman reached the sea-coast Mr. Coffin hastened south, and the information that the flag of the Union once more floated over Sumter was given to the world through the Journal, and was telegraphed over the country before any paper in New York had possession of the intelligence. His letters were regularly read by more than a fourth of a million of people.

Upon the breaking out of the war between Austria on the one side and Prussia and Italy on the other, Mr. Coffin, accompanied by Mrs. Coffin, sailed for Europe, but Austria having been crippled by the single battle of Koniggratz, a truce was declared, Mr. Coffin remained abroad, however, writing a series of letters on current events. He was absent two years and five months, traveled extensively in Europe and Asia, and made the acquaintance of many of the public men in the countries visited.

Mr. Coffin's published books are "My Days and Nights on the Battle-field," "Following the Flag," "Winning his Way," "Four Years of Fighting," "Our New Way Round the World," "The Seat of Empire," "Caleb Krinkle," "The Boys of '76," "Story of Liberty," "Old Times in the Colonies," "Building the Nation," "Life of Garfield," "History of Boscawen and Webster," and he has in preparation a volume on the battle-fields of the war.

He has given many addresses before teachers' associations, and a course of lectures before the Lowell Institute. During the winter of 1878-79 a movement was made by the Western grangers to bring about a radical change in the patent laws. Mr. Coffin appeared before the committee of Congress and presented an address so convincing that the committee ordered its publication. He also appeared before the committee on labor and made an argument on the "Forces of Nature as Affecting Society," which won high encomiums from the committee, and which was ordered to be printed. The honorary degree of A.M. was conferred on Mr. Coffin in 1879 by Amherst College.

He is a resident of Boston, and was a member of the Legislature for 1884 and '85, and served on the committees on education, civil service, the liquor law and the special committee for a metropolitan police for the city of Boston.

Mr. Coffin possesses, in an eminent degree, the respect and confidence not only of the citizens of Boston, but of thousands throughout the land who know him through his books.

MOSES GERRISH FARMER, eldest child of Colonel John and Sally (Gerrish) Farmer, was born in Webster (then Boscawen) February 9, 1820. In early life he attended the district school and the academy on Boscawen Plain. He entered the Phillips Academy, in Andover, Mass., in 1837, and in 1840 he entered Dartmouth College, where he remained three years, and then was obliged to leave on account of ill health. (The degree of A.M. was conferred on him by the faculty of Dartmouth in 1853.) After leaving college he became preceptor of Elliott (Mc.) Academy, and was married in that town, December 25, 1844, to Miss Hannah T. Shapleigh, of Berwick, Me. After this he taught in Dover, N. H., until 1847, when he turned his attention wholly to scientific pursuits, which were much more congenial to his tastes than school-teaching.

He began his experiments in electricity in 1845, inventing at that time an electro-magnetic engine. In 1846 he constructed a small electro-magnetic engine, also a small railroad track, and exhibited the same in various towns and cities, lecturing upon the subject of electro-magnetism and its applications, showing also how it could be adapted to the use of torpedoes and submarine blasting. His first lecture was given in Dover, and one of his experiments was made with a miniature ship placed in a wash-bowl of water. The ship was blown up by electricity, and, coming down, struck on the top of the lecturer's head. This was, perhaps, the reason why the experiment was never repeated before another audience; but the circumstance is often recalled now as ships may so quickly be turned into kindling-wood by the torpedoes which he uses at the present day.

In 1848, Mr. Smith, president of the Portland Line of telegraph, and Mr. L. L. Sadler, superintendent of the Boston and New York Line, were one day talking over the possibilities of the telegraph system and the uses to which it could be applied, and Mr. Smith suggested that an alarm of fire might be given by it. They agreed that Mr. Farmer could devise the machinery necessary to do it, if any one could. They laid the matter before him, and, at the end of a week, he had constructed the first machine in the world for giving an alarm of fire by electricity, consisting of the striking part of an old clock and a miniature electrical machine. The matter was dropped at that time, but Mr. Farmer continued his investigations, and, in 1851, he was summoned to Boston to superintend the construction of the telegraphic fire-alarm. Great difficulties were to be overcome, and fresh inventions were needed at every step until, on April 29, 1852, the first alarm was given, and for the next three or four years Mr. Farmer was untiring in his labors and watchings. During the first fifteen months after it went into operation he spent forty-three nights in the fire-alarm office in Boston, considering it unsafe to leave it long enough to return to his home in Salem. In 1859 he generously gave the system to the city, waiving all his rights under the patent law.

His investigations have been unceasing in the departments of electro-metallurgy, multiplex telegraphy and the electric light, and his inventions are manifold.

In October, 1872, Mr. Farmer accepted the professorship of electrical science at the United States Naval Torpedo Station, established in 1869 at Newport, R. I., for the instruction of the officers of the navy in electricity and chemistry as applied to the arts of war; and since his connection with the department the station has been supplied with the best known magneto-electric machines and appliances to be found in this or any other country.

"He stands in the foremost ranks of scientific men, and it may, perhaps, be truthfully said that, as an electrician, he is without a peer on this side of the Atlantic, while among the scientists of Great Britain, France and Germany, his opinions are quoted as authority. His reputation is world-wide and his inventions are everywhere known. He is often called, as an electrical expert, in the United States courts, where his statements are never questioned.

"An eminent electrician said of him recently,—"Mr. Farmer has undoubtedly done more real and lasting good to the world through his abandoned inventions than through those which he has patented, for the former are seed-thoughts, scattered over the world, which many will gather up, and from them reap a harvest after his life-work is over.

"Unlike many scientists of the day, whose speculations lead them to doubt the existence of a Deity and of a Divine revelation, Prof. Farmer sees in all the works and laws of nature a Divine mind. Each new discovery to him is one of God's thoughts, and with him religion and science go hand in hand."

HEZEKIAH FELLOWS was born in Salisbury, December 22, 1782, but settled in Webster and engaged in trade on Corser Hill with his brother Moses. For many years he was a prominent citizen of the town, and a man of too much individuality to be unnoticed or easily forgotten. From 1816 until 1855, he was town clerk, losing his office when the Know-Nothing or Native American party rose to its brief eminence. He was in the Legislature in 1829, '34, '35.

He was a man of remarkable independence of character, which manifested itself in dress and manner, as well as in opinion. His integrity was unimpeachable. Everybody trusted him. In trade he was strictly honest and impartial. He always adhered to the old currency, marking his prices in shillings and pence. His face would sometimes relax into the semblance of an amused smile at the puzzled look of some customer better versed in the new arithmetic than the old.

Under an apparent gruffness was hidden a kindly heart and a love for children. Perhaps his most marked characteristic was his shrewd, strong common-sense.

In 1817 he presented the Congregational Church and Society with a large Bible, which was used in their pulpit for many years. He was a constant attendant at church, occupying the pew nearest the pulpit on the right hand.

"Prior to 1837 it was the custom of town clerks to make public announcement of those intending marriage, which was done by Esquire Fellows, after the benediction, at the close of the afternoon service. The congregation wanted to hear the 'crying,' as it was termed, and possibly allowed the publishing of the bans to usurp the place of the sermon in their minds, as they smiled and nodded one to another."

He died October 10, 1861, honored and respected by all.

MAJOR ALFRED LITTLE was born in Webster, June 3, 1823, and was the son of Henry and Susan Little. He became crippled in early life through severe illness, and was obliged ever afterwards to use crutches.

He was noted from childhood for his musical talent and for his correct ear, which had much to do with shaping his career in after life. In 1840 he began to work in the melodeon and seraphine shop of Charles Austin, in Concord, N. H. He soon became tuner of these instruments, and succeeded to a great degree in overcoming the slowness of speech and reedy quality of tone, which had been serious defects in them. He invented and manufactured for his own use an orchestral melodeon, an instrument of considerable power, and yet of remarkable sweetness, unsurpassed for its versatility of musical effects, its inimitable tremolo and its power of dynamical expression. He attained wonderful skill in the manipulation of this instrument, and, as a player of the round-keyed melodeon, was without a peer in the world.

He began giving concerts in 1846, the first one being in Fisherville (now Penacook). His musical entertainments were full of variety, for he possessed a rare gift of improvising and an extensive acquaintance with popular music, old and new, and a voice of great sweetness and pathos. He excelled as a ballad-singer, and knew how to unlock the fountain of tears as well as to touch the springs of laughter.

"Ever ready to respond with voice and instrument to the calls of charity and patriotism, cheering the patient on his bed of suffering or bringing a Sabbath-school song to children, he made friends everywhere; and many a wayfarer was aided by his helping hand or cheered by his pleasant sympathy."

He was appointed file-marshal of the Twenty-first New Hampshire Regiment by Colonel Joseph E. Pillsbury, receiving the honorary commission at the hands of Governor N. B. Baker.

Although music was his special delight, Major Little was a man of varied tastes and culture, a poet as well as a musician.

He died suddenly in West Concord, December 27, 1880. Few carry with them "beneath the low green tent" more blessings of the poor or more heartfelt love of friends than did Alfred Little.

ARTHUR LITTLE, D.D., was the son of Simeon B. and Harriet (Boyd) Little, and was born in Webster May 21, 1837. His boyhood was spent on his father's farm where he acquired that invaluable and yet indefinable development of mind and body which the boys of well-ordered New England homes gain from nature and domestic surroundings. He prepared for college at the Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, N. H., and graduated from Dartmouth College in 1860. He studied theology at Andover and Princeton. Before the completion of his studies, he received the appointment of chaplain of the First Vermont Heavy Artillery, and was ordained for this office at Webster, March 16, 1863. He was mustered out of service July 7, 1865. In October of the same year, he was settled over the Presbyterian Church in Bedford, N. H., where he remained three years. He then received a call to Fond du Lac, Wis., where he was settled over the First Congregational Church in November, 1868. In 1878 he was called to the pastorate of the New England Church in Chicago, where he still remains. He was elected moderator of the National Congregational Council, in Concord, N. H., in 1883, and performed the duties of that office with great acceptance.

Dr. Little is a man of genial temperament and possesses rare tact in winning the esteem of all classes. He is a good speaker, having something of the strength and depth of voice which many will remember as having belonged to his father. His sermons are characterized by earnestness and practicality. His style is clear and vigorous. He married, August 15, 1863, Miss Laura E. Frost, of Thetford, Vt., who died in January, 1883.

DEACON ENOCH LITTLE (2d) was the son of Deacon Enoch Little and the grandson of Enoch Little, one of the early settlers of Webster. He was educated at Pembroke Academy and taught school in Boseawen and other towns. He gave much attention to music and was a member of the Martin Luther Musical Society, of the Central Musical Society, and of the Boston Academy of Music. He did much to cultivate a taste for sacred music in his native town, having been, for a long time, leader of the choir in the Congregational Church, as well as a successful teacher of singing-schools. He took great interest, also, in the advancement of agriculture and of sheep-husbandry.

He was a man of vigorous mind, of strong convictions, a diligent student of the Bible, a constant attendant upon church services, and for thirty years an officer of the church. From early life he was an active member of the Sabbath-school, both as teacher and pupil. He was ever ready to give to objects of benevolence and was a strong pillar in the church. He died in the full hope of Christian immortality, honored and respected by all, October 13, 1875.

EPHRAIM LITTLE was the son of Richard and Priscilla (Plumer) Little, and was born in Webster, April 14, 1829. He was married, December 22, 1847, to Jane G. Farmer, sister of Professor M. G. Farmer. He purchased the farm on Pleasant Street, now owned by Plumer Kilburn, and built a house on it, where he resided until the feebleness of his wife's health made a change of residence desirable, when he sold his farm. Mrs. Little died June 27, 1867. He afterwards purchased the farm formerly owned by Nathan Pearson, near the Blackwater, where he lived until his death, April 23, 1885.

Mr. Little was a man of quiet tastes, but intelligent and thoroughly informed on all subjects of current interest. He was for some years a member of the superintending committee of schools. He also held the position of secretary and treasurer of the Merrimack County Mutual Fire Insurance Company from its organization until his death.

Rarely have we met with one who realized more fully, in his life and character, David's description of a citizen of Zion, in Psalm xv. His unselfish kindness and ready sympathy won for him the sincere love and respect of all who knew him.

HENRY LITTLE, D.D., son of Jesse and Martha (Gerrish) Little, was born in Webster, March 23, 1800. At the age of fifteen he united with the Congregational Church, and from that time was an active Christian. When he was nineteen, he taught school in Boseawen, where fourteen of his scholars became Christians. He visited from house to house, and helped twelve men to begin family worship.

He fitted for college with Rev. Dr. Wood of Boseawen, at Salisbury Academy and at Hanover. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1826, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1829, and was at once ordained as an evangelist in Park Street Church, Boston, with fifteen other home and foreign missionaries. While a senior at Andover, Dr. Porter gave him the credit of bringing twenty from the two classes below him in college to the seminary. This fact led to his being chosen agent for the American Education Society, a position which he filled for two years in New England and the West.

In June, 1831, he accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church in Oxford, Ohio, where, in less than two years, two hundred and ninety-seven were added to its membership. In 1833 he was appointed secretary and agent of the American Home Missionary Society, having the whole country west of the Alleghanies for his field, in which his labors were crowned with success. He was pastor of a church for two years in Madison, Ind., during which time sixty were added to the church. His main life-work was that of home missions; but he was an earnest Sabbath-school worker, and was active in promoting the cause of general education. He is said to have been the originator of the first graded school in Indiana.

An article in the Independent of May 9, 1867, by Rev. Dr. Tuttle, of Wabash College, sets forth the labors of Dr. Little:

"From Marietta to Evansville, from Cleveland to La Porte, this man has gone, planting churches, building up waste places, encouraging home missionaries, searching out the scattered sheep, holding protracted meetings, everywhere welcomed, honored and loved. Thirty-six years has he been at this work, until he has publicly addressed more audiences, visited more churches, worked directly in more revivals in Ohio and Indiana, talked to more people, seen more changes in communities and persons than any other man that can be named.

"So where he will, he meets those who crowd everything but him, as God's instrument, off so who have been changed by him, those who have caught the best impulses of life from him, and now, in the year, 1867, this blessed man has preached forty-one times in eight days, in one pulpit, preaching the gospel in such a cheerful light that his hearers exclaim, 'I would to God we could love it as he does.'"

He died February 25, 1885. He married, September 19, 1831, Miss Susan Morton Smith, of Hatfield, Mass.

Of his eight children, four are sons, all of whom are in the gospel ministry.

JACOB LITTLE, D.D., son of Jesse and Martha (Gerrish) Little, was born in Webster, May 1, 1795. At the age of eleven years he became a Christian and united with the Congregational Church. He fitted for college with Samuel Wood, D.D., and at Meriden Academy, graduated at Dartmouth in 1822, and at Andover in 1825. He was ordained as an evangelist at Godstown, N. H., and first preached six months at Hoosick, N. Y. In 1826 he went to Ohio and spent a year in home missionary work in Belpre and neighboring towns.

In 1827 he was settled over the Congregational Church in Granville, Ohio, where he remained until 1864. An unhappy quarrel had divided the church, but, with consummate tact, Mr. Little brought the different factions together, and became pastor of the reunited organization. He was an indefatigable worker, exceedingly systematic, not at all bound by conventional rules or methods, but eminently successful in attaining results. His parish was six miles square, but he regularly visited every family belonging to his congregation, organizing Conference and prayer-meetings, as well as Bible classes in every district, which were conducted with astonishing efficiency. He had, also, the rare faculty of setting everybody at work. He soon became known as "the plain preacher," the man who dared to speak boldly in condemnation of vice.

His New Year's sermons were always reviews of the year, and proved him to have a genius for statistics, as will be shown by an extract from the one for 1849:

"This township has 411 families and 1376 adults. It has 37 drinking families, 119 drinking adults, 21 drunkards, and during the past year has consumed 1173 gallons of intoxicating liquors. The families having no altar are 21; reading no religious papers, 22; children between six and twenty-one attending no Sabbath-school, 179; adults who visit work or journey on the Sabbath, 181; neglect public worship, 115; cannot read, 22; use profane language, 189; use tobacco, 81; play cards, 83; attend balls, 49; supposed to be ignorant, 777. The sending of 159 persons to Botany Bay would blot from our history most of the above number."

During Dr. Little's pastorate at Granville there were added to his church one thousand and forty-one members, of whom six hundred and sixty-four were received upon profession of their faith. In these years he preached about five thousand sermons, and more than one thousand persons are supposed to have been led to a religious life through his ministry.

Besides his pastoral labors, he was a frequent and a valuable contributor to the religious press. The academy for young men and the seminary for young women in Granville both owed their existence and much of their prosperity to his efforts, and of the latter he was a trustee. At different times he was a trustee of Western Reserve, Central and Marietta Colleges.

In 1864 he resigned his pastorate at Granville and removed to Warsaw, Ind., where he lived until 1874, preaching occasionally. Thence he removed to the home of his son, Rev. Charles Little, in Wabash, Ind., where he died December 17, 1876, aged eighty-one years.

He married, first, Lucy Gerrish, of Canterbury, N. H., June 1, 1826, who died October 5, 1834; second, Ann Dorothy Thompson, March 23, 1836. His three sons are all in the gospel ministry.

SIMON BARTLETT LITTLE was born in Webster December 16, 1797, and was the son of Benjamin Little, Esq. His education was acquired at the common school. In early life he was a news-carrier, supplying the people of Hopkinton, Boscaawen, Salisbury and Andover with the Concord Gazette. Besides carrying papers, he executed errands. By this means he acquired his first money.

Mr. Little was a born leader, and was recognized as such by his fellow-citizens without any effort of his own. He was selectman ten years, two years a member of the legislature and a delegate to the convention for the revision of the Constitution. Between the years 1839-1858, inclusive, with but two exceptions, he was elected moderator at the annual town-meeting. He was endowed with a judicial mind, and held through the active years of life a magistrate's commission. He was administrator of between thirty and forty estates and was concerned in the settlement of nearly as many more. He received nearly twenty appointments as guardian for minors or insane persons, and held a large amount of funds in trust. His business as a conveyancer of deeds was very large,—nearly one thousand. Men who wished to make their last wills and testaments called upon him for counsel, and he wrote a large number. He was for about fifteen years president or director of the Granite Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and, for fifteen years or more, director and secretary of the same. In speaking of the part he had taken in public life, he once said,—“I have been elected more times to some responsible office in town by ballot, from 1828 to 1860, than there are years, and I can say what many cannot,—that I never, directly or indirectly, solicited a nomination or vote.” He was one of the leading men of the church and religious society. He was a frequent contributor to the press, writing on a great variety of subjects and always in a clear, vigorous, incisive style. Mentally and physically, he was sturdy and honest. He was naturally conservative, a Puritan of the eighteenth century and opposed to all innovation; but those, even, who opposed him politically, ever acknowledged his integrity, the honesty of his intentions and his sterling worth. He died December 29, 1874. His first marriage was September 16, 1824, to Miss Harriet Boyd, of Andover, N. H., who died October 3, 1850. His second marriage was to Miss Phebe Killburn, of Webster, October 20, 1851, who survives him.

REV. EBENEZER PRICE, first pastor of the Congregational Church in Webster, was born in Newburyport, Mass., September 14, 1771. He began his preparation for college at the age of seventeen in Moore's Charity School in Hanover, entered Dartmouth College in 1789, and graduated in 1793. He studied theology with Rev. Elisha Thayer, D.D., of Kingston. He was first settled in Belfast, Me., in 1796, where he remained for six years. He was married in 1799 to Lucy Farrar, of Hanover, N. H.

It will be remembered that the first meeting-house in Webster was built in 1791. At that time there was no organization, either of church or society. The town owned the frame of the meeting-house, and individuals owned the pews. In this state of affairs Mr. Price was invited by the citizens of the town to labor among them, and his preaching was followed by manifest increase of religious interest. The Western Religious Society was organized in January, 1804, and a church of eight members was formed in September following, when Mr. Price was installed pastor. The whole number added to the church during his pastorate of thirty-three years was two hundred and sixty-two. The greatest number added in any one year was sixty in 1838. The greatest number on the church rolls at any one period was one hundred and ninety-eight. After his dismissal, May 10, 1837, he continued to reside in town, and became superintendent of the Sabbath-school, which position he held for eleven years.

Upon the formation of the Granite Mutual Fire Insurance Company he was elected secretary. In 1859 he went to Boston to live with his eldest son, Ebenezer Sewall Price. He died in Boston, February 19, 1864, aged ninety-two years.

Father Price was a perfect gentleman and noted for his dignified courtesy. He was fond of riding on horseback, and sat upon his old black horse with a stately grace not often seen at this day.

He took a lively interest in all benevolent or philanthropic movements. He was a faithful minister, an exemplary Christian, respected even by the irreligious, and greatly beloved by those who could appreciate godliness of life and character.

He was twice chosen to represent the town in the Legislature. In 1830 he collected materials for a chronological history of the town, which was published by private subscription in 1823.

* His sermons preached at the funeral of Deacon Benjamin Swartz and upon the death of Rev. Dr. Wood, were published by request. He was the author of the letter to Hon. Daniel Webster, which elicited his reply to his New Hampshire neighbors.

 His relations to the church and society, and especially to his success in the ministry, Rev. Edward Boston, were always fraternal and helpful. As a pastor he was ever mindful of the wants of his people, sympathizing with them in their bereavements and afflictions, and entering as heartily into all their joys. He was so mindful of all classes that in his public prayers, the aged, the middle-aged, the young, the youth, the infants were all remembered. His desire to leave nothing undone, to neglect no class, to fill the full measure of his responsibility, not infrequently made his prayers and sermons of undue length, occupying from fifty to seventy minutes.

"In this respect he did not stand alone. In the ministry at that period brevity was the exception, length the rule. At the beginning of the century people expected a service to occupy at least two hours. During the short days of winter those who lived farthest from meeting sometimes saw the sun disappear behind the Warner hills before they reached home. Not were they restless under a sermon that occupied an hour in the delivery. They expected a long sermon, and would have found fault with the brevity of the sermons of the present day.

"His last years were marked by serene peace and composure. He was an attendant at Mount Vernon Church, in Boston, and listened with delight to the preaching of Rev. Dr. Kirk, who looked upon him as a father in the ministry. His influence never can be measured, for under his preaching such men as Enoch Corser, Jacob and Henry Little were led to enter the ministry, and through their instrumentality thousands have been brought to a religious life."

On being asked by his son how he felt in regard to death, he answered, "Oh! that was all fixed years and years ago. I committed myself into the hands of my Maker; He has taken care of me hitherto, and I have no fears for the future."

He was buried in Webster, almost under the shadow of the old meeting-house where he began his labors, and among the graves of his old people.

There are many other citizens of Webster, in the past and in the present, who deserve record here. Every shade of character, every variety of talent has been developed on the hillsides of this quiet country town. Poetry, romance and tragedy, written and unwritten, have been lived in these valleys. Neither is the history of Webster without its comic side. It has had its full share of odd characters, whose names and sayings have come down to us by tradition.

James Corser was one of these men,—an eccentric genius, fond of puzzling answers. His neighbors on either side bore the names of Knight and Day. Mr. Corser was asked where he lived, and answered, "In Twilight." Being asked still further where Twilight was, he replied, "Between Knight and Day."

Obadiah Elkins was a man whose natural oddities may have been intensified by disappointed love in his youth. It is not strange, then, that his stream of domestic bliss did not always flow smoothly. But, unlike most aggrieved or aggrieving husbands, he usually left his better-half in peaceable possession of the fire-side, and sought another spot whereon to build his cabin and set up his individual household gods. By the time this was accomplished the quarrel would be over, and he would take his wife to the new house and begin over again. At last, having built, so tradition runs, twenty-eight houses, he grew tired of moving, and resolved to build a house for his sole possession. This was not an impossible thing, for he was a man of slender proportions, while his wife was a woman of majestic stature. So he built a house of but one room, with one door, so narrow that only himself could enter, and here he could retire to dwell in peace until the storm of feminine wrath should blow over, or his own fit of sulks should clear away.

Once he made his way to Pillsbury's mill-pond, resolved to commit suicide; but after holding his head under water for a while, he waded back to shore to take up the burden of life again, complaining that he "couldn't hold his breath long enough to drown."

One night, when the moon was at its full, a passer-by found Mr. Elkins busy with a burning-glass, trying, as he said, "to light a fire by moonlight," adding that he "had often done it with sunlight, and did not know but he could with the moon."

James Fellows was another man of pronounced individuality, whose words and actions ran in diametrically opposite directions, and who must always be interpreted by the law of contrariety. No man ever was a kinder neighbor than he; neither was there ever a man who could be more surly and gruff. At one time a neighbor was in want of hay. He went to beg Mr. Fellows to sell him some, knowing that he had an abundance in his barn, but met with a flat refusal. He urged the matter, but Mr. Fellows demanded gruffly, "what he was hanging about there for?" and ordered him off. The would-be purchaser obeyed, and turned reluctantly homeward; but before he had reached the road, Mr. Fellows called out imperiously, "What are you going away for? Come back! I've got hay enough! Why, I'll give you five hundred!"

David Heath was a living illustration of the grotesque in speech, look and manner. He earned the sobriquet of Jester by his fondness for jokes. In those days hoop-poles were an article of commerce, and Mr. Heath was more solicitous about securing his desired complement of hoop-poles than regardful of boundaries between his own and his neighbors' wood-lots. At last Captain Little Burbank, tired of a commerce so unprofitable to himself, said to Mr. Heath, "If you will agree never to cut any more poles on my land I'll give you a pig." "All right," was the answer, "I'll promise." In due time Captain Abraham Burbank, hearing of his brother's success, resolved to make a bargain for himself with the Jester, and offered him a sheep if he would resign all claims to hoop-timber on his land thenceforth and forever. "Ah-h-h!" he replied, shaking his gray head, "I won't do to sell all out, Captain Burbank."

Moses Jackman was drafted for military service during the war of 1812, but when he presented himself for examination he was, to all appearance, blind. Various expedients were resorted to by the examining surgeons to ascertain whether his blindness was real, but his eyes showed no symptoms of seeing. He was retained for further trial. While the matter was pending he astonished those about him by exclaiming, as a mouse appeared upon the scene, "Oh! see that mouse." "What! do you see him?" asked someone. "No," was the quick reply; "but I smell him." At last a plank was laid over the edge of a boat, and he was placed upon it and ordered to walk over it. He obeyed and walked off the end into the water. Whereupon he was adjudged stone-blind and sent home. A guide went with him, but after they had gone a few miles Mr. Jackman said he "thought he could find the way now," and nothing more was ever heard of his blindness.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

ENOCH COUCH.

Enoch Couch was born in Boscawen (now Webster), N. H., April 12, 1793, on the old place where two generations had preceded him. He received his education at the district school, and, like all farmers' boys, assisted in required duties at home. Upon the death of his father, in 1821, the responsibility of the farm devolved entirely upon him. He was a man of strong physique and very active, adding largely to the home-farm by industry and hard work. He was shrewd and far-seeing in business affairs, yet strictly honest and upright in his dealings. He was firm in his convictions, conscientious in his adherence to principles, and willing to give the credit of like honesty where it belonged. He was greatly respected in the community, and was regarded by those who knew him as a Christian, although he never connected himself with any church. He died April 23, 1867.

He married, first, Nancy Eastman, who died without children; second, Jane O. Stickney, of Brownfield, Me., who died July 30, 1877. By this union he had three children.—Nancy E., born February 12, 1825, who occupies the old homestead; Joseph, born March 22, 1837; Mary S., born June 12, 1844. She married Orlando Whitney, and died April 17, 1876, leaving one son, Herbert C.

Joseph, the son of Enoch Couch, was also a man highly respected in his native town. In early manhood he was a successful teacher, and, after the death of his father, assumed entire charge of the farm. He died of quick consumption March 14, 1872.

Miss Nancy Couch, the only surviving member of his family, furnishes this portrait as a tribute to her father's memory.

HISTORY OF WILMOT.

BY W. W. FLANNERS.

CHAPTER I.

AT the commencement of the present century the territory which now constitutes the town of Wilmot belonged to and was a part of New London, Kearsarge and New Chester. New London bordered on Springfield, Danbury, New Chester, Kearsarge, Sutton, Fishersfield and Wendell.

The most thickly-settled parts of New London at that time were in the extreme southerly part of said town, on Colby Hill, Burpee Hill, Morgan Hill and Leper Hill. There town-meetings were held and town affairs were managed.

In the northerly part, near Danbury line, in the vicinity of what is now known as the Hobbs neighborhood, was the most considerable settlement of that part of the town—a region, also, of hills and elevated land. There were settlements on Prescott Hill, and along down the slopes toward the swamps, valleys and water-courses. Between these settlements in the north and in the south there was an extensive forest-land situated in the valley of the outlet of Pleasant Pond, and its water-shed on either side, tenanted by a few in log cabins and humble residences, scattered and isolated in small openings, many of them spending much of their time in fishing and hunting.

The most direct and shortest way of communicating between these settlements at the north and south ends was over foot-paths, private cart-ways and other private ways, meandering from settlement to settlement, a distance of about twelve miles. But to reach one of these settlements from the other by a continuous open public highway, the travel must have been north through Springfield to Colby Hill, or south through Andover, Kearsarge and Sutton to Colby Hill and a distance of about twenty miles.

The two ends had no occasion to meet except for town purposes, and to vote for State and county officers. In politics, Federalism prevailed at the south, and ever controlled the town by a large and reliable majority, while Republicanism was the prevailing and almost unanimous political sentiment at the north.

Were it not for voting the State and county ticket, and for electors, a general meeting of the citizens would never have occurred, or of any considerable portion of those in the north with those in the south, except casually and by accident.

Between these sections there was no business connection to call them together. Agriculture was then the vocation of all. Whatever was done by way of manufacturing lumber was for local use in building residences and stables; none for transportation or foreign market. The mercantile business consisted wholly in exchanging farm products for groceries and other necessaries. This was accomplished by the farmer himself, who, in early winter, transported with their own teams, generally horses, but sometimes oxen, "below," as it was generally termed, their products, and brought back in exchange a yearly stock of goods for family use and a little cash. From a common knowledge of the varying energy and enterprise of individuals in all communities, it is easy to perceive how readily the business of teaming and of a country merchant spring into a regular and constant business.

Whatever progress may have been made in producing the teamster and merchant at this time, one thing is certain: the surplus products of the north went down through Andover to Salisbury, from whence came their groceries in return, while those of the south went down through Warner to Hopkinton, and onward. Thus the business relations of our section extended down the east side of Kearsarge Mountain, and that of the other down the east side, making the two sections isolated and independent, in respect to each other, so far as the business of gaining a livelihood was concerned.

The history of civilized communities shows that a community of business interests, though varied and branching out in different kinds and channels, when co-operating, so as to build up and encourage each other by creating and extending a market for the various products, enhancing the value and increasing the demand for each kind of labor, thus promoting the wealth of the community, has an element of power to maintain and perpetuate itself, through local attachment and aspiration for gain it would foster and gratify.

Yet, from the same source it appears, in distinct and emphatic lines, that, while an important and necessary ligament in holding and perpetuating communities in prosperity and union, it is of itself and alone, the weakest of the necessary bonds for that great end. The sentiment of reverence for a Supreme Being and of worship for such Being, is as universal in man as his self-shness, and stronger than all other sentiment. Honest, sincere devotions of a religious faith and worship, common to them all, are bound together by ties that can be severed only by death. To maintain and enjoy the inestimable privilege of communion and worship, they will sacrifice comfort, convenience and property; will break the fires of persecution and wade through seas of blood to the fagot, the stake and to martyrdom.

This strength of conviction and purpose applied to the great leading doctrines of the Bible, in which all religious denominations agree, has brought inestimable blessings to man. Whenever the differences which distinguish religious denominations enter and become an element of this conviction and purpose, exerting equal power and influence over the believer's conduct, it brings mischief only. Unfortunately, there was not a common religious sentiment and worship at the north and the south; unfortunately their differences became the leading and foremost thought in the presence of each other; unfortunately, there was apparently greater zeal manifested and greater sacrifices made to promulgate a partisan and sectarian religion than in promulgating those great and all-important truths in which all agreed. It is conceived that this zeal and effort was not so much on account of the importance given to the point of difference between the sects as from a sense of wrong done to each from a misconception and statement of their views and reasoning.

The prevailing religion and only organized church at the south was that of the Calvinistic Baptists, who were close communionists and believed in the doctrine of election and fore-ordination.

In the north there were Free-Will Baptists, with some Congregationalists. The burden of their sermons, exhortations and sacred songs was the free moral agency of man; his power, privilege and duty to flee from the wrath to come and escape eternal misery, denouncing bitterly the doctrine of election and fore-ordination as wholly irreconcilable with that of the free moral agency of man. They charged the Calvinistic Baptists with preaching and proclaiming from the pulpit infant damnation, and that the spirits of eternal misery were suffering by the predetermined will of Jehovah. And thus the very excellent, moral, religious, patriotic and enterprising people of the south were regarded by the equally worthy people of the north as Federalists favoring an aristocratic and monarchical form of government; as religious exclusionists, who claimed to believe in the saved, to be such by election. Such were some of the diverse and inharmonious relations in the year 1800.

Kearsarge Gore at this time embraced a large tract of land lying on the north and south sides of Kearsarge Mountain. It was an unincorporated place, paid a public tax and had town privileges. Its population was one hundred and seventy-nine. In politics and religion they agreed. Their town-meetings were held on the north and south sides of said mountain alternately.

Nothing existed among them in the way of contention, except it might be in the selection of local officers and matter of highways. Whichever side of the mountain election was held, they were sure to carry the day. This was accounted for by the inconvenience in getting over the mountain.

At this time the construction of a road leading from Concord to Vermont, at the White River Junction, leading through what is now the town of Wilmot, and then the northern part of New London and Kearsarge, became an important, if not the leading, enterprise with the people of New Hampshire along the line of the proposed route.

The settlements in New Hampshire and Vermont had become numerous and extensive enough to require more direct and feasible roads to accommodate the increasing demands of an increasing interest in Northern New Hampshire and Vermont. The old rough and hilly roads winding high up mountainsides and over hill-tops, in diverse ways, to accommodate hill settlements, could no longer serve the long travel and freight seeking the sea-board for the necessities and luxuries desired for home comfort.

Tramways had been made to accommodate through travel and freight, but only so far as they would accommodate the local settlements, which were universally upon the hills and elevated lands, as such were more easily reduced to cultivation, all such local improvements still left the ways for any and all travel unnecessarily steep, tedious and dangerous.

At that time local means were too limited to open up and put in safe condition roads on the most feasible route for through travel by taxation. The business enterprise of traffic and travel sought accommodation and relief through its own resources, and in 1800 applied to the New Hampshire Legislature for an act of incorporation, authorizing certain persons to build the Fourth New Hampshire turnpike road, on the most feasible route, leading from Concord, N. H., to Connecticut River, at White River Junction, in Lebanon, N. H., which enterprise resulted in making the Fourth New Hampshire turnpike and putting it in running order, in the year 1806. This enterprise opened a new channel of business, new and better ways of communication, new business relations and better outlook to those living and located along this Fourth New Hampshire turnpike. This change induced the inhabitants in North New London and Kearsarge to apply to the Legislature for an act to incorporate the northerly part of New London and that part of Kearsarge Gore north of Kearsarge Mountain into a town by the name of Wilmot. This act was obtained in 1807. This act authorized Samuel Messer, Jr., and Benjamin Cass to call a meeting of the inhabitants for the purpose of choosing all necessary town officers. Agreeably to said act, Samuel Messer warned a town-meeting for the inhabitants to meet at the dwelling of James Philbrick on the second Tuesday in March, 1808.

At this meeting they elected Samuel Messer, Jr., moderator; William Johnson, town clerk; Insley Greeley, Eliphalet Gay and Jabez Morill, selectmen. In the vote for State and county officers at this meeting, it appears that John Langdon had twenty-nine votes for Governor and John T. Gilman two votes; Benjamin Pearce thirty votes for councilor; James Flanders twenty-two for Senator, Benjamin Philbrick had one vote for Senator, John Moody one vote, Samuel Prescott one vote; for register, Isaac Brooks, twenty-two; for treasurer, Joseph Town, twenty-one. There were votes taken also for other minor officers.

At said town-meeting they voted to raise two hundred dollars for schooling and voted the town be divided into three school districts—North, Centre and South Districts; also voted to raise twenty dollars for defraying town charges. In the year 1808 there were forty-six resident tax-payers; twenty-four of these resided in that part known as Kearsarge Gore, and twenty-two in the part formerly New London.

The Kearsarge Gore and the northerly part of New London constituted the town of Wilmot till the year 1832, at which time, by an act of the Legislature, a certain tract of land then a part of New Chester, on the northerly side of Ragged Mountain (so called), and separated from the main part of New Chester by Ragged Mountain, was severed from New Chester and annexed to Wilmot, and at the present writing (1885) constitutes the town of Wilmot.

HISTORY

ORGANIZATION OF COUNTY—BENCH AND BAR.

BY JOHN S. MCLINTOCK A. M.

BELKNAP COUNTY, named in honor of Rev. Dr. Jeremiah Belknap, the earliest historian and annalist of New Hampshire, occupies the geographical centre of the State, and, with the adjoining county of Merrimack, is entirely surrounded by other counties. It does not come in contact with any territory outside of New Hampshire. Its surface is considerably above the level of the ocean, five hundred feet at the shoreline of Lake Winnipiseogee, and is diversified by mountain, hill and valley, rivers and lakes. Gilman-ton Mountain is the highest elevation. Its area of about one hundred and fifty-five thousand acres of improved land is very fertile, and the soil produces good crops of wheat, corn, potatoes, hay and other products of a temperate climate.

Politically, it came into existence December 20, 1840; before that it had formed a part of Stratford County. It is divided into ten townships, one of which was incorporated during the reign of George I., two in the reign of George III. and seven since the organization of the State government. It began to be settled at the close of the French and Indian War. Laconia is the shire-town.

Its chief sources of wealth now are the manufacturing industries mostly located along the Winnipiseogee River, which, in its course through the county, falls about two hundred and fifty feet.

The scenery is very pleasing and annually attracts a large number of visitors during the summer.

The Bench and Bar.—The legal fraternity of the towns comprised within the limits of Belknap County have always held a high social position in the community, and would compare favorably with the same class in any other county in the State. They have been called upon to occupy the highest offices within the gift of the people, and have honored the confidence reposed in them. At no time in the history of the State have they stood higher in the esteem of the people than at present.

The record of the early lawyers in many cases is lost—a name only being handed down by tradition. In 1794 Eben Smith was practicing law in Meredith. In 1814 John Mooney and Jonathan C. Everett were in practice there. In 1820 John Thompson was in practice at Centre Harbor. In 1832 W. G. Webster was at New Hampton. S. W. Rollins, of Meredith village, has been county solicitor, and later judge of Probate for many years.

WILLIAM HARPER, the first lawyer of Sanbornton, came from Deerfield before 1785, was a member of the convention which framed the State Constitution, was representative from 1791 to 1800, was frequently moderator at town-meetings, and was a land-owner. He died December 31, 1809.

JOHN A. HARPER, son of William and Mary Lane Harper, of Sanbornton, was born in Deerfield November 2, 1779, was the first postmaster of Sanbornton, was colonel in the militia, member of the Eleventh Congress (1811), settled at Meredith Bridge and died June 18, 1816.

DANIEL C. ATKINSON, son of Simeon and Phebe (Clark) Atkinson, was born in Bosswen September 8, 1784-85, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1806, studied law with Parker Noyes and Daniel Webster, settled at Sanbornton Bridge in 1810. He was Senator, councillor and judge of Probate (1824) and moderator of town meetings. He married, first, Mahala Tilton; second, Melitable Tilton (sisters). He died April 5, 1842.

MATTHEW PERKINS, born in Sanbornton June 17, 1788; married Jane Little, was a lawyer of decided talent, and an orator. Settled at Sanbornton Square, and died August 17, 1826.

CHARLES J. STUART, born in Peterborough September 20, 1788, of Scotch-Irish parentage; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1809, and commenced practice at Sanbornton Square. He was a famous singer and of large size. He married Eliza Austin and finally moved to Lancaster, where he died May 17, 1836.

CHARLES GILMAN studied law with Matthew Perkins, and succeeded to his practice at Sanbornton, where he remained from 1826 to 1833. He is said to have died in Baltimore in 1878.

BENJAMIN BOARDMAN, born in South Reading, Mass., February 15, 1798; studied law with Samuel Fletcher, of Concord; was admitted to the bar in 1825; married Anne Stickney, of Concord; practiced law in Sanbornton from 1833 to 1836, when he removed to Meredith Bridge; in 1847 he moved to Lawrence, Mass., where he remained until 1867; he died in Concord April 3, 1871; his house in Laconia was the pleasant home of the judges during the sessions of the court; he was the last lawyer settled at Sanbornton Square.

ASA P. CAFE, born in Northfield June 1, 1813; read law with Judge Nesmith; married Clara Proctor, and commenced to practice about 1843. Although his residence was in Northfield, his office was on the Sanbornton side of the river; he was several times representative, president of the State Bank, candidate for Governor, president of a national bank, and judge of Probate of Merrimack County; he died December 12, 1874.

BENJAMIN A. ROGERS, a native of Northfield; practiced law at Sanbornton Bridge from about 1840 to 1858; he married, first, Viola E. Rundlet; second, Adeliza S. Rundlet (sisters); he afterwards studied for the Episcopal ministry and is settled in Texas.

CHARLES C. ROGERS, born in Bloomfield, Vt., August 19, 1834; read law with Benjamin A. Rogers and succeeded to his practice in Tilton in 1858; he married Sophia T. Curry, and is still in practice.

FRANCIS R. CHASE, born in Gilmanton April 5, 1818; studied law with Judge Dana, of Fryeburg, Me.; married Huldah P. Fessenden; settled in Conway; was representative in 1852; Speaker of the House of Representatives in 1855; settled in Northfield in 1866, and practiced in Tilton; represented the town in 1871-72; was a prominent Episcopalian and died March 12, 1876.

JAMES O. LYFORD, born June 28, 1853, in Boston; moved to Canterbury in 1866; read law in Concord; opened a law-office in Tilton in 1880; he holds a clerkship in the War Department, at Washington.

STEPHEN MOODY, born in West Newbury, Mass., January 21, 1767; graduated at Harvard College in 1790; was admitted to the bar in 1793, and settled the same year in Lower Gilmanton; he was the first lawyer of Belknap County; he married Frances Coffin; was repeatedly moderator of town-meetings, and died April 21, 1842.

JOHN HAM, born in Dover December 30, 1774; graduated at Dartmouth College, 1797; was admitted to the bar in 1800, and a year later settled in Lower Gilmanton; he was frequently chosen selectman and representative; he married Wealthy C. Brigham, and died March 7, 1837.

BENJAMIN EMERSON, born in Alfred, Me., March 20, 1792; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1816; married Rebecca S. Porter and settled in Gilmanton, where he was admitted to the bar in 1822; he was repeatedly moderator and representative.

NATHANIEL COGSWELL, born January 19, 1773; graduated at Dartmouth College, 1794; commenced to practice in Gilmanton in 1805; he was afterwards a general in the Mexican army and died August, 1813.

NATHAN CROSBY, born February 12, 1798; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1820; read law with Stephen Moody; was admitted to the bar in 1824, practiced a short time in Gilmanton, and finally settled in Lowell, where he died in 1884.

JAMES BELL, son of Governor Samuel Bell; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1822; was admitted to the bar in 1825; married Judith Upham, and opened an office at Gilmanton Iron-Works; he afterwards removed to Exeter.

GEORGE MINOR, a graduate of Dartmouth College in 1828; was admitted to practice in 1831; he opened an office at Gilmanton Iron-Works, but soon removed to Concord.

ARTHUR LIVERMORE, a graduate of Dartmouth College in 1829; was admitted to practice in 1833; opened an office in Gilmanton and afterwards moved to Bath.

IRA A. EASTMAN. (See Merrimack County Bench and Bar History.)

EDWARD ST. LOE LIVERMORE practiced law for a short time at Gilmanton.

WILLIAM BUTTERFIELD graduated at Dartmouth College in 1836; admitted to the bar in 1840; married Rosamond Robinson and practiced a few years at Gilmanton Centre; he afterwards moved to Concord and for many years was editor of the Patriot.

GEORGE G. FOGG, a native of Meredith; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1839; was admitted to the bar in 1812, and settled at Gilmanton Iron-Works; he was afterwards an editor, minister to Switzerland and United States Senator.

GENERAL JOSEPH BADGER, for many years judge of Probate of Stafford County, was born in Haverhill, Mass., January 11, 1722; married Hannah Pearson and moved to Gilmanton in 1763. He was a prominent citizen; a member of the Provincial Congress and the first Constitutional Convention. He was several times a member of the Governor's Council. He died April 3, 1806.

THOMAS COGSWELL, from 1784 to 1819 chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, was born in Haverhill, Mass., August 14, 1746; married Ruth, daughter of General Badger; served in the army during the whole Revolutionary War; won the rank of colonel; settled in Gilmanton on return of peace. He died September 3, 1810.

THOMAS COGSWELL, son of William and Judith (Badger) Cogswell, a nephew of Thomas Cogswell, was born, December 7, 1798, in Atkinson; lived in Gilmanton. He was a judge of the Court of Common Pleas for Belknap County from 1841 to 1855; was justice of the peace for over forty years and a councillor in 1856; married Mary Noyes and died August 8, 1868. His son, Thomas Cogswell, is a prominent lawyer of Gilmanton.

WILLIAM BADGER, a grandson of General Joseph Badger, was born in Gilmanton January 13, 1779; married Martha Smith; was representative, Senator, president of the Senate, Governor of New Hampshire two years. From 1816 to 1821 he was associate justice of the Court of Common Pleas.

LYMAN B. WALKER was an attorney at Gilford for many years. For five years he was Attorney-General of the State. He was a brilliant man, and a man of much influence. He frequently encountered Franklin Pierce in the court-room.

STEPHEN C. LYFORD, at Laconia for many years, was a lawyer of large practice; esteemed to be a good lawyer and stood well in the profession. He went South late in life and died there.

CHARLES F. STONE, forty-two years of age; was born in Cabot, Vt.; He graduated at Middleton College in 1869; and read law with Governor Stuart and Judge Hibbard; He was admitted to the bar in 1872, and in practice in Laconia.

HISTORY OF ALTON.

CHAPTER I.

THE town of Alton lies in the eastern part of the county and is bounded as follows: North by Lake Winnepesaukee, east by Strafford County, south by Barnstead and west by Barnstead, Gilmanston and Gilford.

This town was originally called New Durham Gore. It was first settled about 1770 by Jacob Chamberlain and others. In the petition of 1794, for incorporation, the citizens asked that it might be called Roxbury, but it was finally named Alton, after a town in Southamptonshire, England. Barndoor Island was annexed to the town in 1799. A portion of the town was annexed to Barnstead in 1849, and a portion to Wolfborough in 1849.

Incorporation of Town.—The following is the petition of the first inhabitants to have New Durham Gore incorporated, 1794:

"To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, to be convened at Amherst in said State on the first Wednesday in June next,

"The petition of us, the subscribers, Freeholders and Inhabitants of a place called New Durham Gore, in the County of Strafford and State aforesaid

"Humbly Sheweth—That your petitioners have a long time labored under many inconveniences, for want of an incorporation, in their not having legal power to lay out and make roads for the accommodation of the Inhabitants and public, to build a meeting-house for public worship, settle a minister of the Gospel, raise money for the maintenance of schools, and to transact and do many other things relative to town affairs, which the Inhabitants of the aforesaid towns in this State, by law, exercise and do, notwithstanding which difficulties they have always cheerfully contributed their full proportion towards the support of government, and been friendly attached to the Laws of the State. Your Petitioners therefore pray that the above-mentioned Tract of Land, now called New Durham Gore, and bounded as follows—to wit—Beginning at the southwest corner of New Durham, and running north by the side line thereof, about nine miles and three-quarters, to the north-westerly corner of said New Durham, then running North forty-eight degrees East, by said New Durham line about two miles and three-quarters to the southerly corner of Wolfborough, then running north-west to Winnepesaukee pond, then running by the shore of said pond, as that runs a westerly course as far as Gilmanston line, then southerly upon said Gilmanston line as far as the line of the town of Barnstead, then running southerly of as said Barnstead line runs to the Bonds first mentioned,—may be erected and incorporated into a township by the name of Roxbury, and that the inhabitants thereof may be created into a Body politic and corporate, to have continuance and succession forever, and invested with all the powers and franchises with all the rights, privileges and immunities which other towns in this State hold and enjoy, to hold to said inhabitants and their successors forever. And that Mr. Eleazer Davis may be authorized to call a meeting of said inhabitants to choose all necessary and customary town officers, giving such notice and under such regulations as your honors may deem necessary, and that the officers then chosen may be invested with all the powers of such officers in other towns in this State. And that every other meeting which shall be annually held in said Gore for that purpose may be on the second Monday of March forever, or otherwise point out any other mode of relief to your petitioners in the premises, as your honors in your wise consideration shall think best, and your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray—

The following is the petition of Joseph Pierce, 1794:

"State of New Hampshire } To the Hon^{ble} the Senate and House of Rep-County of Strafford } resentatives in General Court to be convened at Amherst in said State. The Petition of Joseph Pierce, of New Durham Gore in said County

"Humbly Shews—That a petition, signed by sundry of the Inhabitants of said New Durham Gore, has been presented to the General Court, praying that the Tract of Land called New Durham Gore in said County might be incorporated, and have such Privileges as other towns of said State enjoy. That it is not convenient said Tract should be incorporated as the form of the same is such that the Inhabitants never can, without much difficulty, meet together for public worship for the doing the necessary town business, or for any other public or social purposes, as said Tract is not six miles wide in the widest part, and that Part is separated and divided for several miles together by a large Arm of Winnepesaukee pond called merry meeting bay, that said Tract is nearly sixteen miles in extent from the most southerly to the most north-westerly part of the same, and the difficulty of passing from one to the other is greatly increased by the intervention of large and almost impassable Mountains, low wet grounds and swamps that the most southerly easterly part of said Gore is an acute angle, and your petitioners' farm is so situated as to make said Angle, and is removed further from the centre of said Gore than any other farm in the same or can be. That your Petitioners' said farm, which contains about fifteen hundred Acres is about seven miles to the said Centre, and the roads leading to the same go over very high hills and are in general very rough, and ever wet & very uneven. That your Petitioners has felt the employment to be a north pursuit, and has for several years last past engaged himself in cultivating waste Lands, making public roads and advancing the general good of said State. That your Petitioners never had any thought that said Tract of Land would be incorporated, more especially as said In-lands and woods heretofore, at a public meeting held for that purpose, voted that they would not petition the Legislature for such incorporation. That such incorporation, if had, would evidently lessen the value of your Petitioners' Interest in said Gore, and would place him in a situation much worse than he now is. Therefore your Petitioners asks of your Honours that if the Legislature should pass an Act incorporating said New Durham Gore, that the said Town of your Petitioners may not be included in said incorporation, or that his said Town may be made into a separate corporation, or that your Honours would take such other order thereon, as you in your great wisdom should think fit.

New Durham Gore, May 29th, 1741.

"JOSEPH PENNY."

The following memorial is relative to incorporating the town, 1791:

"To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, to be convened at Andover in and for said State on the first Wednesday in June next.

"The petition of the Subscribers, freeholders and Inhabitants of a certain tract or parcel of land called New Durham Gore, Humbly Sheweth That whereas we understand sundry Inhabitants of said Gore are about petitioning the General Court of said State for an incorporation, which if granted without the liberty herein after expressed, will greatly distress the undersigned petitioners as well as the Inhabitants of the other remote and attenuated parts of said Gore, by reason of its being so extensive in length and running into sharp peaks and narrow corners, which lapover, cover and lie behind almost impassable Mountains, and your petitioners living in the southerly peak of said Gore, and so far distant from the intended center as to render it utterly impracticable for them to be connected or embosomed with the aforesaid applicants and would greatly lessen their property. But they are of opinion that a town or parish might be formed and erected out of the middle of said tract of land by cutting off the several corners of it agreeably to a plan thereof herewith exhibited.

"Your petitioners therefore pray, that in case said incorporation should take place, your honours would reserve liberty for your petitioners and such others as now do or may hereafter live in the aforesaid extreme parts or corners of said tract of land, at any time when either of them so think it convenient to be set off with their estate and be annexed to any other towns adjoining, as they may see fit, and which shall be willing to receive them in such way and manner, and under such regulations as your honours shall think fit: otherwise we shall forever be delinquent from town privileges, merely by use, it has been our misfortune to settle in this tract of land, which was let out in the running the other towns adjoining, for the owners of Messuage, and which we never expected would be incorporated into present form, but would be annexed to another town, which might have been obtained without difficulty or objection had it been reasonably requested, but we are sorry to say that we have every reason to believe our Brethren are too much biased to consult the benefit of their Neighbourhoods as well as themselves, but we are convinced that a change in our situation for your honours, to whom we look up for protection and our Fathers, will be sufficient.

The following is a copy of the petition for an act of incorporation, 1796:

"To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court, convened at Exeter in &c for the State of New Hampshire on the first Wednesday of June, Anno Domini 1796. Humbly Shew.

"The subscribers, your petitioners inhabitants of a place called and known by the name of New Durham Gore, in the County of Stafford in said State. That your petitioners are, by means of their present situation, subjected to many depreciable inconveniences, being unincorporated, and, of course, deprived of those privileges and immunities enjoyed by the neighbouring towns. That the Land on which your petitioners now settled, and that which remains as yet in a state of nature, is good and capable of rapid improvement, was sufficient to furnish completely an incorporation.

"That we are already more numerous than many places, within our knowledge, which have been admitted to the enjoyment of town privileges, and that a speedy enjoyment thereof numbers can only be obtained by the want of an incorporation. That we are deprived of the speediest and most eligible method of raising money for the support of the school industry, schools and for the laying out, making and repairing highways. That your petitioners conceive an incorporation would remedy many evils besides those above enumerated; be a means of disseminating knowledge and contentment among the inhabitants, conduce to a speedy settlement of unimproved lands, and finally add a respectable town to the State of New Hampshire.

"Your petitioners therefore pray your honours that they may be ranked among the happy citizens of this State by being admitted to an incorporation, and as in your honours will ever pray.

The following is the petition of Jacob Chamberlin relative to the election of representatives in 1778:

"To the Honorable the House of Representatives for the State of New Hampshire:

"Gentlemen

"I, who am an Inhabitant of the Gore, have, by a friend, heard your Honours had sent a precept to Woffborough, the Gore and New Durham, requiring these three towns to meet and make choice of some man to Represent them at the next general Court, and as the Inhabitants of the Gore had no kind of notice or warning that there was to be such a choice, I applied to one of the select men of said New Durham to know the Reason why we were not notified, and he told me, it was no matter whether we knew it or not, as there is said to be no law, though I thought it very unreasonable that a New Durham select man should Determine whether we in the Gore should be represented or not I cannot think why we were not notified, unless it was for this Reason—that as they know Woffborough never attends the meetings they might choose whom they pleased, and it seems they think they have no one in their town fit they must put upon a man in a far off and distant who, we think, very little acquainted with the Circumstances of the Gore, what ever he may be with Woffborough, and we desire to submit it to your honours who their such a person, chosen in such an illegal manner—and, as I have been informed, only by 5 or 6 men, is a suitable person to Represent these towns. If we have no man among us fit for a Representative we had much rather comply in the wisdom and justice of your honours to Represent us than that any person, chosen in an illegal manner, should presume to do it. We, upon the whole, think we are slighted and very ill treated in this matter, and hope that your honours, in your great goodness, will see we have Justice Done us. I am, in behalf of the Gore, your most humble Servant,

"STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

"To the Hon^{ble} the House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire.

"The Humble Petition of us, the Subscribers, Inhabitants of the Gore, in the County of Stafford, in said State, Sheweth

"That we have been informed their Honours, the late General Court, had sent a precept to the Select Men of New Durham, Directing them to Notify the Inhabitants of Woffborough and the Gore to Meet at said New Durham, for the Choice of a Representative to attend this present

General Court; and that, notwithstanding the Same Direction, we never had any kind of Notice or warning of such Meeting, but the Inhabitants of said New Durham met and chose a Representative, which appears to us to be illegal, and Pray the Said House may be so advised, that we may have the privilege of Voting at any future Meeting for the Choice of Representatives, which we think we have a just Right to Claim, And that the Inhabitants of Woffborough have never attended Such Meetings, on account of the Great Distance they are from New Durham Meeting-House.

That they have intimated to us their Great Desire to be present at Such Meetings, if the Place appointed was an Inhabitable Government for the three towns, and That Lieut. Charles Rogers, at Merry meeting Bay, would be the most suitable, at which Place they would punctually attend. And your Petitioners, as in Duty Bound, will Ever Pray, &c.

The following is the petition relative to roads through the Gore:

State of New Hamp^t } To the Hon^{ble} Council and House of Repre-Strafford, } sentatives in General Assembly convened.

The Petition of the Subscribers, Inhabitants of a Place called the Gore, adjoining New Durham and Woffborough, Humbly Show that upon a certain Petition preferred to the General Court, praying a Wagon Road should be made & repaired from New Durham, by Merry Meeting, to Woffborough, through said Gore, & another Road from said Merry meeting to Gilmanton, at the Cost of the owners of the Land through which said Road should run; upon which Petition, on the 23^d day of June, 1756, it was enacted that said Road should be made & repaired as aforesaid, at the Cost of the Inhabitants & owners of said Gore, in the same Proportion as the State Tax, and that the said Inhabitants & owners shall be liable to the same Pains and Penalties as any Town in the State not repairing Highways, by which act your Petitioners, the Inhabitants of said Gore, humbly conceive that they are laid under greater Inconveniences & Disadvantages than any other Inhabitants of this State by being subjected to large Costs, in to Pains and Penalties, for large Tracts of Land that your Petitioners never had any the least civil or political Connection with; Your Petitioners, the said Inhabitants, being few in number, living upon the Borders of said Gore, owners only of the small Parcels of Land they severally live upon without the Benefit of any Incorporation, being obliged to make all necessary Repairs to their own abodes, esteem it a great Hardship which they are unable to go through in being obliged to make and maintain Roads through Land of others, that your petitioners can receive no Benefit by. If such part of said Gore as would accommodate your Petitioners was incorporated into a Town or Parish, your Petitioners would then esteem it reasonable to be made liable, with the owners of Land within such Incorporation, to perform everything necessary for Highways; or as that is not the Case, your Petitioners are willing that their Lands should be rated in common with other Lands in said Gore, to all Necessary Highways, in which Sense your Petitioners humbly conceive to be the Prayer of the first Petition, upon which the aforesaid act was made, otherwise your present Petitioners would have taken Benefit in shewing Cause why the Prayer of the same ought not to have been granted. Wherefore your Petitioners humbly pray you Hon^{ble} Court to take under Consideration their present Circumstances & inability to fulfil the Requisitions of said Act, & to order that the Lands only in said Gore be taxed towards said Roads, and your Petitioners shall ever pray.

Resolved that the said meeting, first adjourned to Monday, 20th Day of April, be so that the Hon^{ble} Court will consider one in our Proportion of Taxes for the present year, we, the said Inhabitants, think we are aggrieved, the reason for your Honours would consider our, being but few in Number, & also we pray, & it is our desire to get those men sent for to serve in the Continental service as being more than our proportion, according to other Towns.

The following relates to the inability to furnish men for the army:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

To the Hon^{ble} the House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, in their Session, To the Hon^{ble} the Committee of Safety of said State. The Representation of the Select Men for themselves and other inhabitants of the Gore, in the County of Strafford, Sheweth,

That there is no more than thirty seven ratable Poles in the Gore, and those in general very poor and necessary, and dispersed over a large Tract of rough, wild Land, that we are much in Arrears for our Poll and men supplied last year & the year before, & that but a small proportion of the Inhabitants have paid their last year's taxes, and say they are unable to do it.

That there has been demanded from us, by the Hon^{ble} Court, four Men to serve in the Continental Army for three years, or during the War, which is a common thing in other Towns for forty Men, much more able than we are, to be classed in one Class, to get one Man.

That we have, as we conceive, been always much over rated, and altho the Hon^{ble} Court have ordered a considerable Abatement in our Taxes, yet the Treasurer constantly sends his receipt to us for the whole Sum demanded, and we are this year charged a high price, for the Deficiency of Poll not supplied last year, which we suppose ought not to be the case, as it is contrary to a Resolution of the Hon^{ble} Court.

And that notwithstanding we labour under so many peculiar Disadvantages, we have exerted ourselves to the utmost to get two Men, hoping, if we could have succeeded in the Attempt, we might have been favored as to the other two, but we are sorry to see that after spending a great deal of Time and Money, we have not been able to get one Man at any Rate, we have ordered our Cattle, part of our Land, or any other Thing without our Reach, to no purpose.

We thought it our Duty to make the Representation, hoping that we might be alleviated of some of our Difficulties, and that you might take such further order hereon as you in your great Wisdom should think fit.

JOSEPH ROBERTS, }
JOSIAH SMITH, } Selection

The Select Men beg leave to note further that if their whole proportion of Men is four, the number now being 2 of them, allowing the above-mentioned abatement, their just proportion would be but about three, altho they have heard that the Sheriff has a receipt for the whole Sum in Town of the four Men.

The following is a certificate of the number of ratable polls, 1783:

Strafford, ss. Pursuant to a Vote of the General Court, This may Certify that there is forty Ratable Poles, from Twenty One years old and upward, living in New Durham Gore.

The following is the copy of a petition asking to have the annual meeting held in March, 1784, legalized:

"STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"To the Hon^{ble} the General Assembly of the State of New Hampshire:—
"The petition of the Subscribers chosen Selectmen of the Gore, in the County of Stratford, in said State, Humbly Sheweth,—

"That the Inhabitants of the Gore aforesaid held an annual Meeting in March last past, when they chose Selectmen, Collector, &c., as usual at such meetings, but as their power of holding meetings ceased with the late proposition Act, their transactions were void, of Course.

"Wherefore your petitioners pray that the Choice of the Town Officers, and other proceedings at said annual Meeting may be established, and the trouble and expense of another prevented.

"JOSEPH ROBERTS,
"JOSEPH PIERCE,
"ELEANOR DAVIS."

This petition resulted in the passage of the following resolution, legalizing annual meeting:

"STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"In the House of Representatives, Octo. 29, 1784.

"Whereas the Selectmen of the Gore (so called), in the County of Stratford, have petitioned the General Court, setting forth that the inhabitants of said Gore, in March last, held a meeting & chose all officers as usual to assess & collect their Taxes, but as their power of holding meetings ceased with the late proposition Act, their proceedings were void; wherefore they prayed that the choice of officers & other proceedings at said Annual Meeting might be established.

"Therefore Resolved, That the meeting held in said Gore, in March last, be established, and the officers chosen to assess & collect their Taxes are hereby fully authorized & empowered to transact the necessary business of their respective offices as fully as if said Proposition Act had continued in force through the current year.

"And the officers chosen at said meeting are hereby empowered to call a meeting for the purpose aforesaid, sometime in March next; And the officers for the respective years to call meetings annually to choose such necessary officers until a new proposition of the State Taxes shall be made Sent up for Considerance.

"Geo. ATKINSON, Speaker.

"In Senate, October 29 1784, read & Concurred,
"M. WEAVER, President."

At the first town-meeting after the town was incorporated it was voted to build an "Orthodox Congregational Meeting-House." The frame of this church was raised in the fall of 1797, but it was never entirely finished. Meetings were held in it, however, more or less, until about 1849, when it was sold for a town-house.

In 1798 the town voted to raise one hundred and sixty-six dollars for the support of the gospel ministry, and about this time the Rev. Mr. Whipple was employed to preach, and remained here two years.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

MAJOR GEORGE D. SAVAGE

Major George D. Savage was born in New Durham, N. H., March 7, 1818. His father, Captain Benjamin Savage, was one of the sturdy pioneer yeomanry of the State, and his mother was descended from a like ancestry. Major Savage was the oldest of ten children, eight of whom lived to adult life.

His boyhood and youth and part of his early manhood were spent on his father's farm. After he had attained sufficient age, the winter months were spent in teaching school. He early evinced great ardor for military life, and as a boy and young man, took much interest in the militia trainings and musters of half a century ago. As soon as old enough he enlisted in the State militia and gradually rose to the rank of major, and served in that capacity a number of years. The title thus obtained clung to him through life, and he was known far and near till the time of his death as Major Savage, notwithstanding the fact that he was promoted to a higher rank during the War of the Rebellion.

In 1849 he moved to Alton, N. H., and engaged successfully in shoemaking, merchandising and hotel-keeping, being proprietor of the Cochecho House about twenty-five years, where he achieved the reputation of being one of the most genial and popular Bonifaces in the State. He was active, generous-hearted and public-spirited, and was held in the highest esteem by those who knew him best. The projection and building of the Cochecho Railroad was largely due to his enterprise and influence. In politics he was a prominent, active Republican, sagacious in council, bold in utterance and uncompromising in his political principles.

When war sounded its dread alarms, and the call came for more troops to defend the nation's flag, the old military ardor was once more aroused, and with the cry of "Come, boys!" Major Savage offered his services in his country's cause. Says one writer, "The history of the raising of the Twelfth New Hampshire Regiment is too well known to be repeated. The fabled Cadmus sowed dragon's teeth and raised a crop of men, but we are ignorant of the time it took to mature that crop. Colonel Whipple, Colonel Stevens and Major Savage sowed the seeds of patriotism and loyalty, and in four days a thousand men, as loyal as ever stood, was the result."

Mythology was eclipsed by reality. The major of militia was commissioned major of volunteers. They were enlisted September 17, 1862, and went at once to the front. His regiment went into action in the battle of Fredericksburg, and at Chancellorsville, May 3, 1863, as Major Savage was repeating orders from the colonel, he was shot through the jaw by a sharp-shooter, which shot nearly cost him his life. After partially recovering from the wound he returned to the regiment and remained until honorably discharged, May 28, 1864. He was promoted to a lieutenant-colonelcy February 5, 1864. At the same time he was wounded at Chancellorsville, his brother Henry, captain of Company A, in the same regiment, was killed. The military career of Major Savage was perhaps not distinguished by superior manoeuvres or tactics, but many a sick and weary soldier was cheered by his kind words and hearty sympathy, he often dismounting from his horse to give such one a ride or carry his knapsack. He possessed in an eminent degree those qualities of heart that served to endear him to the members of his regiment, and his memory is tenderly cherished by every surviving comrade.

After returning to private life (1861) he was appointed a deputy sheriff, which position he held to 1880. In 1861-62 he was a member of the State Legislature. In 1866 he was elected railroad commissioner for three years. He was a member of the Masonic order and the first Commander of the G. A. R. Post at Alton. Few men were better known in the State, and perhaps none had more friends. He died of consumption at his home in Alton, February 17, 1883, leaving five children who still survive (1885).—Mrs. John W. Currier, Mrs. George F. Jones, Mrs. Charles H. Downing, George Frank (who is proprietor of the Cocheo House, so long kept by his father) and Miss Jessie Savage.

AMOS L. ROLLINS.

Amos L. Rollins was born in the town of Alton, N. H., December 11, 1826. His father, Ichabod Rollins, Jr., was a farmer and died when Amos was but nineteen years of age. His grandfather, also named Ichabod, was one of the earliest settlers in the town of Alton, whither he came from Newington, N. H.

Amos L. was brought up as a farmer's son, receiving only such educational advantages as were to be obtained at the common schools of the village. He has done more or less at husbandry all his life; but for many years his time has been chiefly taken up with the public business of the town.

The first official duty to which he was chosen was that of town clerk, which position he held five years. In 1862 he was elected second selectman of Alton, and in 1864 was chosen chairman of the board, and that position he has held each consecutive year to the present writing (1885). He has also held the office of moderator for twenty-one years in succession, and the office of town treasurer seventeen years. He was chosen a member of the Constitutional Convention which met at Concord, 1876. He has been county commissioner three years, and has been treasurer of the Alton Five-Cents Savings-Bank from its organization to the present time.

He has been a member of the Masonic fraternity since 1866, and was secretary of the order four years.

In political affiliation he is a Republican, and in religion a Free-Will Baptist, and has been superintendent of the Sunday-school three years.

He married, in Alton, December 25, 1851, Sarah E. Kimball. They had five children,—three sons and two daughters. In 1866 he lost two of his sons aged nine and one years respectively, by diphtheria. Mrs. Rollins died April 23, 1871, leaving Mr. Rollins with a family of three children. His second marriage was to Permelia A. Penhagast, of Barnstead, N. H., June 14, 1872. March 29, 1875, he lost his only remaining son by consumption. At present his family consists of wife and two daughters, one of whom, the elder, is married and lives in Manchester, N. H.; the younger resides with her father.

The best evidence of the esteem in which Mr. Rollins is held by his neighbors and townsmen is shown by the various positions of office and trust in which they have placed him. Probably no man who has ever lived in the town of Alton has filled so long and ably the various offices of the town, or made more personal sacrifices for the welfare of its people. In whatever position he has been placed he has sought neither personal emolument or aggrandizement, but simply and solely to do his whole duty.

His advice and counsel are sought constantly in the multiform perplexities that arise in the course of daily life and business, and is candidly and freely given. There is, probably, no one who knows Mr. Rollins who would for one moment doubt his sincerity or candor in any opinion he might express. He is widely known and highly respected throughout the State. The family from which he sprang is an ancient and honorable one in the annals of New England. It has furnished men who have filled ably the public trusts of our land, men who have worn with credit and ability the judicial ermine, men who have stood high in the councils of the nation; but it has furnished no better representative of the pure, high-minded, useful and honorable citizen than Amos L. Rollins. The value of such men in a community is best known and appreciated when their career has closed, and their neighbors seek, too often, alas! in vain for some one to ably fill their places in all the duties of citizenship.

ALONZO HAVINGTON SAWYER.

The Sawyer families of New England trace their lineage to Thomas Sawyer, who emigrated from Lincolnshire, England, to America in 1635 or 1636. He was about twenty-one years of age at the time of his immigration, and settled first at Rowley, Mass., but in 1647 he went with the first proprietors to settle the town of Lancaster, Mass. He was married to Mary Prescott. They had a family of eleven children, and from them are descended most, if not all, of the Sawyers of this country.

Alonzo H. Sawyer was born May 17, 1827, in Alton, N. H. He was the son of Hon. Daniel and Tamson (Walker) Sawyer, of that place. His grandfather, Enoch Sawyer, was one of the pioneers of Alton, being the second who built a house in what is now the village. Years later, as the village grew and prospered, he kept an inn and a general store, and was one of the substantial men of the town. His son, Hon. Daniel Sawyer, was one of Alton's principal townsmen.

men, his time being almost wholly employed in public affairs. He was counselor on the staff of Ichabod Goodwin, New Hampshire's famous war Governor, represented his town in the General Court, and held repeatedly the various offices in the gift of his townsmen. He had but one brother, Seth, who was a Free-Will Baptist minister. There were two sisters, one of whom became the wife of Judge Ira Mooney, of Belmont; the other married a Mr. Cate, of Alton. Hon. Daniel Sawyer was easily the leading citizen of his town; a man of strong physical and mental organization, pronounced in his views and opinions and not easily swayed in his judgments. An ardent Whig in politics, he was particularly strong in his anti-slavery views, and also an earnest advocate of the temperance cause. In religion he was a Free-Will Baptist. Public-spirited, and with broad views for the welfare of his town-people, he was a man whose loss was severely felt in the community. He died September 13, 1869, aged sixty-eight years. His children were Alonzo H., Ellen (afterwards Mrs. Jeremiah Jones, of Alton) and Frank P., who married Jennie Farnham, and resides in Lynn, Mass.

Alonzo H. was educated at New Hampton and Gilmanston Academies. He then taught school at various places in New Hampshire and Maine till his twenty-third year, when he married (November 7, 1850) Martha J. Shapleigh, of Lebanon, Me. She was the daughter of Samuel and Eunice Shapleigh. After his marriage he went to Great Falls, N. H., and engaged in merchandising. Continuing there four years, he returned to his native town of Alton; established himself there as a merchant and continued that avocation till within two years of his death, part of the time alone and part of the time in connection with his brother-in-law, Mr. Jones, who succeeded him in the business.

They had one child, a son, Fred. Shapleigh Sawyer, born July 20, 1853; died May 9, 1872.

Mr. Sawyer was appointed postmaster of Alton during Lincoln's administration, and held the office interruptedly a period of twenty years. He was a member of the Winnepesaukee Lodge, F. and A. M. He was town treasurer several years, holding that office at the time of his death. He was a member of the Provident Mutual Relief Association, and one of the trustees of the same. He was an ardent lover of music and possessed a good voice, well cultivated, and was for more than twenty years leader of the choir in the Free-Will Baptist Church, of which he was a member.

He held for many years a commission as justice of the peace, and only for his position as postmaster under the government he might have held at any time any office in the gift of his townsmen. He was a director in the Alton Savings-Bank and a shareholder in the Dover and Winnepesaukee Railroad. He died of heart disease July 17, 1885. His widow survives him, and resides at the homestead in Alton.

At the close of his funeral services the following lines, from the pen of his fellow-townsmen, John W. Currier, were read by Rev. W. S. Packard, the officiating minister:

"Toll the bell softly, toll the bell low,
 Ringing out gladness, ringing in woe
 Telling of anguish, blinding my eyes;
 Breaking my heart-strings, sundering such ties;
 Earthly hopes blasting, cherished dreams dead,
 Heartstone so lonely, he being dead
 Nothing to live for, of him bereft,
 Nothing remaineth, nothing is left;
 Constantly asking—Can it be so?
 Yes, answers Reason—my poor heart—no.
 Reason be gone—It cannot be so,
 Husband is sleeping—toll the bell low.

Thus, brother, sister, husband and friends,
 Neighbors and townsmen, life's chapter ends
 One of our number just stopped before,
 Into the unseen, shutting the door,
 Into the realm of unending day,
 Into the mansion over the way,
 Leaving a record for us to read,
 Teaching us lessons worthy of heed,
 Diligent in business, honest and true,
 Giving to each his merited due,
 Sincere in purpose, noble of mind,
 Simple in manners, neighborly kind,
 Seeking no honors, wishing no fame,
 Character unquestioned, unswerving name,
 Loyal to country, sturdy for right,
 Battling for justice with all his might,
 Honored by office, trusted in such,
 Faithful in little, faithful in much,
 Loving the Sabbath, keeping its laws,
 Liberally giving to every good cause,
 Others might travel, others might roam;
 Best of all places he loved his home,
 Leaving the false and shining parade,
 Such is the record our friend has made.

Take him up gently, bear him away,
 Lay him down softly in the clay,
 Under the green grass, under the skies;
 Cover with flowers the spot where he lies,
 Leaving him there sleeping under the sod,
 Angels to watch him—trusting to God.

This town lies in the southern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: North by Gilmanton and Alton; east by Alton and Strafford County.

This town was granted by Lieutenant-Governor John Wentworth, May 20, 1727, to Rev. Joseph Adams, of Newington, and one hundred and five others, with the following bounds:

"To begin on the Head of the Town of Barrington on the South West side of the Town of Cochrane and running by the said Town of Cochrane eight miles & from the said Town of Cochrane to run on the Head of Barrington Line South West forty Two Degrees six miles & then North West eight miles, then on a straight Line to the head of the first eight miles."

It was impracticable at that time to fulfill the conditions of the grant, and but few settlements were made until 1767.

Among the early settlers were the following: Ebenezer Adams, Colonel Richard Sinclair, James Dealing, John Bickford, Arthur Bickford, Charles Hodgdon, John Elliott, John Nutter, Joseph Bunker, Moses Dennett, John Bunker, Eli Bunker, Jacob Pickering, John Peavey, Isaac Garland, John Keniston, Pitt Lougee, P. Daniels, Samuel Caswell, Captain John Drew, Aaron Chesley, John Tasker, Moses Rand, William Lord, Lemuel Hayes, John Pitman, E. Nutter.

The First Town-Meeting was held November 22, 1775, with Gilmanton. The first grist-mill was erected by John Bunker, about 1769. He also built the first saw-mill in town.

The first postmaster was Charles Hodgdon, Jr., and the first mail-carrier was John S. Shannon, of Gilmanton.

The first reference in the town records to schools is dated March 15, 1792, when it was voted "to have agents in each school district to build a school-house in each district," and the following were chosen: Samuel Nelson, Dependence Colbath and Charles Hodgdon.

The first settled teacher was Cornelius Kirby and his school was in the south part of the town. Money was first raised for school purposes in 1785,—thirty pounds.

The first lawyer in Barnstead was Caleb Merrill, in 1811. Among the other lawyers who have practiced here may be mentioned Isaac O. Barnes, Moses Norris, J. Elkins, A. E. Hodgdon, Benjamin Winckley, Charles S. George, Charles R. Rogers and H. B. Leavitt.

The first physician was Dr. Joseph Adams, in 1792. Dr. Jeremiah Jewett, Sr., also settled here, in 1792. He died in 1836. Among other physicians have been Nath J. T. George, S. P. Woodward, William Grover, Charles Whittle, John Wheeler, William Walker, George W. Garland, Mark Walker, B. W. Sargent, A. G. Weeks, Alvin Jenkins, S. S. Wentworth, Jeremiah Blake, Dana Buzzell, J. P. Elkins, James Emerson. The present physicians are G. H. Hawley and William H. Nute.

The following citizens of this town were in the old French War: John Aiken, Colonel Joseph Sinclair and Joseph Bunker.

War of the Revolution.—The town responded nobly to the colonial cause. In 1775 the population was two hundred and fifty-two. The first reference to this war found on the old town records is under date of April 26, 1775, when Captain Richard Sinclair was paid £1 11s. 6d. for "going down below for the defence of our country."

The following is a list of Revolutionary soldiers from this town:

Ebenezer Nutter, John Clark, Major John Nutter, Jeremiah Jewett, Anthony Nutter, Joseph Place, Valentine Chapman, Joseph Taker, William Nutter, Thomas Welch, Deborah Perry, J. P. Dame, James Davis, Samuel Davis, E. Adams, David Jacobs, J. Young, E. Tobbette, H. Nutter, Captain Jonathan Chesley, Captain John Drew, Thomas Brown, William Lord, Joseph Sabin, Captain Joseph Kaine, Samuel Eastman, Colonel Nath Pease, Robert Tobbette, Samuel Jenness, Ralph Hill, Joseph Hunkins, John Welch, Richard Sinclair, Nathan Nutter, Eli Ham, John Pitman, Perry Dixon, W. Ayres, John Aiken, — Avery, William Hill, Thomas Ayres, James Marden, John Emerson, Samuel Pitman.

War of 1812.—The following men from Barnstead were in the War of 1812:

Captain John Peavey, J. Davis, F. Chesley (Capt.), D. Bunker, J. G.

Holt, Joseph Foye, John Rand, W. Rand, John Kaine, C. Peavey, Silas Bunker, T. Bunker, James Davis, G. T. Barker, John Place, W. Rand and T. Conner.

Nicholas Kenison and Alfred T. Munsey served in the Mexican War. Kenison was killed in battle.

War of the Rebellion.—Barnstead responded promptly to the call of her imperiled country, both in men and money. The following is a list of soldiers from the town:

William B. Aiken, Frank Sleeper, G. H. Bridges. — Dudley, Wm. from Brimrose, E. G. Hodgdon (killed), Captain and Major H. H. Huse Lieutenant J. H. Greenwood (killed), Lieutenant S. J. Albert F. Shackford, 1874 to present time.

The Barnstead Reunion.—One of the most interesting events in the history of Barnstead was the Barnstead reunion, held August 30, 1884. The following is a condensed description of the celebration, taken from the history of the reunion by Horace N. Colebath:

Barnstead, N. H., situated in the southwestern part of Belknap County, northeast from Concord twenty miles, and bordering on the counties of Merrimack and Strafford, contains thirty-six square miles of territory; was chartered by Governor Wentworth, May 29, 1727, containing, in 1880, one thousand three hundred and seventeen inhabitants.

On the east lie the Blue Hills, on the north are the Alton and Gilmanton Mountains, and on the south lies the Catamount, looking down on the valley of the Suncook River as it passes the westerly boundary of the town. It is a region of hill and valley, of beautiful rivers and ponds and laughing brooks.

A community born and educated amid such scenery, breathing the air of its hills and drinking the waters that flow in hundreds of rills down its hillsides, till they form the Suncook, must love their childhood home. For the past fifty years Barnstead has been sending out her sons and daughters to other parts of the land to find new homes. Its first emigrants found homes in Massachusetts, Vermont and New York, and afterwards they sought Ohio, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. As new territory was opened, they helped swell the mighty stream of emigration that has peopled the great West.

To-day they may be found in twenty-eight States and Territories. Some of its sons and daughters are looking out on the Pacific, others are in the valley of the Father of Waters or are fanned by the soft winds of the Gulf.

Scattered over the land these emigrants have ever yearned for the home of their fathers, while those who remained around the old hearth-stones were eager to once more clasp the hands of loved ones, look once more into long-remembered faces, and hear once again the voices that were music to their youthful ears.

This was especially true of those who had passed the meridian and were nearing the sunset of life.

By a sort of common consent, residents and emigrants seemed ready for a reunion of the children of old Barnstead.

The question has been asked, Where did the idea of this reunion originate? This may be a fitting place for answering that question. During the winter of 1877-78 a few of the sons and daughters of Barnstead, residing in Concord, N. H., prominent among whom were Colonel E. S. Nutter, J. L. Pickering, Esq., George W. Drew, Esq., Mrs. James R. Hill and Laura Garland Carr determined to hold a reunion of the sons and daughters of Barnstead living in Concord, with invited guests from the mother-town and other places in New Hampshire where Barnstead sons had located.

Such a reunion was held on the evening of February 28, 1878, at the Phenix Hotel, in Concord. There were present from Barnstead a delegation of sixty citizens, led by the Barnstead Brass Band.

Colonel E. S. Nutter presided and made the reception address. Laura Garland Carr read an original poem. Short addresses were made by J. G. Sinclair, Lewis W. Clark, J. Horace Kent, J. P. Newell and Charles S. George. This, with a supper such as that famous hotel can provide, made the occasion a most enjoyable one.

The resident sons of Barnstead returned home feeling that some day the wanderers from the old town should be invited home to the old domain, and here, amid the scenes of childhood, hold a grand family reunion.

The subject was talked of from time to time, but, from various causes, no decided action was taken until, at the annual town-meeting in March, 1882, it was voted to hold a reunion the coming autumn.

Subsequently the following officers were chosen:

President, Charles S. George. Vice-Presidents, John Walker, John Pendergast, Joseph Jenkins, Caleb Willey, John R. Garland, John L. Nutter, Seth Shackford; Recording Secretary, John H. Jenkins; Corresponding Secretary, Horace N. Colbath; Treasurer, John Franklin Garland; Executive Committee, John Waldo, Thomas L. Hoitt, Ira L. Berry, Horatio G. Willey, Horace Walker; Town Committee, George V. Hall, Albion P. Nutter, Thomas K. Proctor, Smith W. Locke, Seth Shackford, E. Frank Jones, Lewis Clark, Albert F. Shackford, Charles F. Emerson, Daniel E. Tuttle, Hiram Rand, Frank S. Jenkins, John Pendergast, Jacob W. Evans; Auxiliary Committee, E. S. Nutter, Concord, N. H., J. L. Pickering, Concord, N. H., H. A. Tuttle, Pittsfield, N. H., J. P. Newell, Manchester, N. H., C. M. Murphy, Dover, N. H., J. Horace Kent, Portsmouth, N. H., George S. Pendergast, Boston, Mass., Joseph R. Hayes, Lowell, Mass., George F. Knowles, Lynn, Mass., Chairman; Rev. William O. Carr; Marshal, Timothy Emerson, Assistant Marshals, Frank O. George, Henry O. Hamtress, John Band; Superintendent of Halls, Tents and Grounds, Dr. George W. Emerson; Committee to prepare Sentiments, Horace N. Colbath, Charles S. George; Committee to arrange Programme, Dr. George W. Emerson, Horace N. Colbath, Frank S. Jenkins, Thomas L. Hoitt; Committee on Music, Charles E. Walker, Thomas L. Hoitt; Commissary, Frank S. Jenkins; Quartermaster, John Waldo; Toast-Master, Rev. John George.

This organized, the work of preparation began.

Meetings of committees and sub-committees followed in rapid succession, until a week before the day of reunion, when officers, committees and citizens, uniting, made it their special business.

The arrangements as finally made were as follows:

The reunion to be held on Wednesday, August 30, 1882, at ten o'clock A. M.

The president to make the welcoming address.

Rev. A. H. Quint, D. D., to deliver an oration.

Laura Garland Carr to read a poem.

Dinner, free to all, in the tent.

Speeches, sentiments, and responses at the stand.

Music through the day by the Barnstead Brass Band,—the oldest band in the United States, organized February 22, 1837.

A tent, seventy-eight by one hundred and sixty feet, was placed on the grounds of Seth Shackford, Esq., adjoining the town hall and Congregational Church, and both these buildings were opened to the public. The speaker's stand was placed between the hall and church; fronting it was the band-stand.

Under the direction of the superintendent, Dr. Emerson, the tent was beautifully decorated with flags, bunting, etc., and tables were arranged in the tent to seat one thousand and fifty persons at one sitting.

Such were the measures adopted to welcome home those whose hearts had been throbbing at the thoughts of the reunion.

In every part of the town little plans had been laid to bring families and friends together. It was to be the gathering of a great family.

The number in attendance was estimated to be five thousand, over half that number having partaken of the dinner.

The best order prevailed. It was a meeting of well-dressed, orderly and respectable men and women, whom any town might be proud to own as her children.

Owing to the prevailing heat and dust, some things were omitted in the reception, and others might have been changed for the better. Yet, on the whole, we can say, what every visitor did say, "Well done, old Barnstead!"

The following is a list of toasts proposed:

"1. 'Old Barnstead—A good town to go from, a better one to return to.' Responded to by Hon. H. A. Tuttle.

"2. 'A kind remembrance to the sons and daughters of old Barnstead providentially detained from our Reunion.' Response by Colonel E. S. Nutter, Concord, N. H.

"3. 'Old Barnstead—Her fair fame a sure passport for her sons whenever they go, her principles a guarantee of success.' Responded to by Colonel M. B. V. Edgerly, of Manchester, N. H.

"4. 'The adopted sons of Barnstead—They have honored her name, and she rejoices in their success.' Hon. C. M. Murphy, of Dover, N. H., responded.

"5. 'The emigrant sons and daughters of Barnstead—Wherever they be their abiding place, or whatever their duties, let them never forget that they cannot be delinquent without being degenerate.' Hon. John P. Newell, of Manchester, N. H., eloquently responded.

"6. 'The town of Barnstead—She fosters hills and beautiful valleys, but feeling the sentiment and borrowing the language of the Roman mother, she points to her children and exclaims, "These are my jewels." Rev. Frank H. Lyford responded.

"7. "The annual crop produced in Barnstead—judges, clergymen, physicians, merchants, mechanics and farmers—may the crop increase until she has enough for home consumption and a large surplus for exportation." Response by John D. Nutter, Esq., of Montreal, Canada.

"8. "The friends and scenes of our childhood." Colonel J. Horace Kent had been invited to respond to this sentiment, and had written his acceptance; but at the last moment was detained by imperative business, and was unable to be present at the Remon, much to his regret, as well as to the regret of his many early friends. Colonel Kent, however, sent an address, delivered at the Barnstead Remon in Concord, N. H., February 28, 1879, in response to a similar sentiment.

"9. "The soldier sons of Barnstead—the fathers in the Revolution, the sons in 1812, the grandsons in the Rebellion—the love of liberty constrained them." Responded to by letters from Colonel Jas. S. Hatt, of Lacota, N. H., a native of Barnstead and a veteran of 1812; from Colonel Thos. E. Barker, of Boston, Mass., a native of Barnstead and colonel of the Twelfth Regiment in the Rebellion; from Hon. Henry H. Huse, of Manchester, a former resident of Barnstead, who served in the Eighth Regiment as captain and major.

"10. "The birth-place of our fathers—Portsmouth and Newington—names as familiar as household words to every child of Barnstead—may peace and prosperity be in their borders."

"11. "The host of men whose lives have been made better and happier by choosing for wives, daughters of old Barnstead." Responded to by Howard A. Dodge, Esq., of Concord, N. H.

"12. "The social history and reminiscences of old Barnstead." Hon. John G. Sinclair eloquently and wittily responded to this sentiment.

"13. "The resident sons and daughters of Barnstead—May they preserve unimpaired its ancient reputation, keep sacred the memory of the fathers, and be always ready to welcome its wandering children to the old domain." John B. Garland, Esq., of Barnstead, was invited to respond to this sentiment, but on account of ill-health and the infirmities of age was obliged to forego that pleasure, but answered by letter."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. JOHN G. SINCLAIR.

Perhaps the grandest feature of American civilization and the highest tribute to American institutions, is the opportunity and facility offered her sons to rise from the lowest to the highest rank, whether wealth, power, fame, or all these united, be the ambition of the aspirant. There is probably no country on the globe where the results are so entirely in the hands of the individual, and so wholly commensurate with the ability, energy and merit displayed in the prosecution of the end desired. And it is to-day America's proudest boast that her sons have proved worthy the unusual advantages offered them.

Of the various sections of our land, New England has, perhaps, been most prolific in the production of what are popularly known as "self-made men;" men whose childhood and youth were passed amid scenes of privation and poverty, and who, without the advantages that wealth alone can secure, have risen by dint of their own industry and ability, and the innate heroism of their natures, to the highest positions of honor, power and achievement.

Hon. John G. Sinclair is a fair representative of that type of New Englander who, throughout the length and breadth of our land, may be found ever in the vanguard of progress—leaders in the struggle for success in whatever special field they may have chosen. Starting in life under more than usual disadvantages and discouragements, he has achieved an honorable success, of which he and his posterity may be justly proud.

He was born at Barnstead Parade, in the town of Barnstead, N. H., March 25, 1826. He is the only child of Charles G. and Martha G. (Norris) Sinclair of that town.

His ancestors were of a martial spirit, and for three generations did military duty in their country's service. One of the pioneers of the town of Gilmanston, N. H., was Richard Sinclair, and it is claimed that he erected the first frame house in the town. He was a soldier in the French and Indian wars, and also in the War of the Revolution. In the latter war, he attained the rank of captain, though in the locality where he lived he was generally known as Colonel Sinclair. He married Polly Cilley, a sister of Colonel Joseph Cilley, and a descendant of one of the oldest and proudest families of New Hampshire. Their eldest son, Richard Sinclair, Jr., was one of the earliest settlers of the town of Barnstead. Like his father, he was a soldier in the Revolutionary army, and was an ensign in his father's company. His wife was Betsey Hodgdon, and Charles G. Sinclair (father of Hon. John G.) was their only son, who, at the age of seventeen, enlisted as a soldier in the war of 1812, and for a time was clerk for General Ripley. At the sortie on Fort Erie he received a gunshot wound near the right lung, which disabled him for life. He died July, 1834, leaving his wife and only child (then a lad but eight years of age), in destitute circumstances. Mrs. Sinclair was a woman of true Spartan heroism and courage. She set bravely to work with her needle to support herself and son. With true motherly pride and a confidence in her boy's ability, which has since been eminently justified, she determined to do all in her power to give him an education, and so kept him at school at Pittsfield Academy till he was thirteen years of age. He then entered the employ of Webster & Peavey, merchants at Landaff, N. H. The firm consisted of Hon. Samuel Webster of North Barnstead, and Samuel P. Peavey, a former resident of Barnstead, who had married a sister of Mrs. Sinclair.

He remained at Landaff six years, and during the time attended five terms at Newbury Seminary in Vermont, where he fitted for college under the tuition of Bishop Baker and Rev. Clark T. Hinman. Ambitious as he was to enter college and acquire a liberal education, yet a fear lest he might die and his mother be left destitute induced him to forego his desires in that regard and bend his energies to business pursuits. His first venture was a restaurant at the corner of Hanover and Elm Streets, Manchester, N. H. This not proving consonant with his tastes was soon abandoned, and he established an auction and commission business at Lawrence, Mass. He was fairly successful in this, and having acquired limited means, he returned to his native State and established a country store, and also engaged in the manufacture of starch in Bethlehem, N. H. Here he soon won the esteem and confidence of the community, as was evidenced by the fact that in 1852, '53, '54, '55, and in 1862, and '63, and again in 1876, '77 and '78 he represented Bethlehem in the State legislature, and served as its member in the last Constitutional Convention. In 1873, he represented Littleton in the legislature, being then a resident of that town. He was appointed Bank Commissioner by Governor Baker, and served until the American party came into power. In 1858 and '59 he was elected Senator from the Twelfth Senatorial district, composed of Grafton and Coos Counties. He was the democratic candidate for Speaker of the House, and democratic candidate for Governor in 1866, '67 and '68. In 1868, he was chairman of the New Hampshire delegation to the National Convention, and in 1876 was democratic candidate for United States Senator, against Edward H. Rollins, republican.

During all of his connection with the political affairs of New Hampshire he was considered one of the safest, shrewdest and most efficient party leaders. The estimation in which he was held as a public speaker and debater, finds illustration in the fact that the convention which nominated him for Governor in 1867, instructed him to invite General Walter Harriman, the republican candidate (New Hampshire's most eloquent champion of the republican party), to a public discussion of the issues involved in the campaign, the result of which was thirteen joint discussions at principal points in the State, (the first of the kind ever held in New England, though quite common West and South, for many years). Although so frequently elected to offices of trust and responsibility, Mr. Sinclair has never been an office-seeker, and when he left his native State in 1879, he made a public avowal that he would never again be a candidate for a political office, a resolution to which he has rigidly adhered.

In 1879, Mr. Sinclair removed to Orlando, Orange County, Florida, where he has established a large and lucrative real estate business, and is also engaged in the cultivation of oranges and other semi-tropical fruits.

Though he has chosen his abode in the land of flowers, yet he cherishes an abiding love for the snow-clad, rock-ribbed hills of the land of his birth, and is keenly alive to all that affects her prosperity, perpetuity or interests. His recent speech before the New Hampshire Club in Boston fully sustains his reputation as a most gifted post-prandial orator. He is vigorous in mind and body, giving promise of many future years of usefulness.

Mr. Sinclair has been twice married; first in 1847, to Tamar M., daughter of Colonel Daniel Clark of Landaff. By this marriage, there were three children—Charles A., Emma S. and Martha A. His first wife dying, he married in 1872, Mary E. Blandin, daughter of John Pierce, Esq., of Littleton, N. H.

THOMAS L. HOITT.

Graceful versatility is generally a marked trait in the character of the New England man. When promising prospects invite he will promptly change his home and business for another location and untried occupation. While he readily conforms and adapts himself to changed circumstances and customs in a new situation, he still holds in sweet remembrance the home and scenes of his youth, for no land affords homes with dearer childhood associations than New England.

Thomas Lewis Hoitt was born in Barnstead, near the Parade-ground, April 1, 1827, being the seventh in a family of five sons and seven daughters, children of Benjamin Hoitt, a respectable farmer, who was born in Hampstead, N. H., in 1790. His grandfather, Thomas Hoitt, born in Chester about 1750, was a gentleman of fine education for his time, especially in mathematics, and in his younger days was engaged in teaching and land-surveying. The late Rev. Enos George, of Barnstead, was one of his pupils. His name appears on the roll as ensign in the company of Captain Samuel McComel at the battle of Bennington. He subsequently joined the United States navy, and rose to the rank of lieutenant, and was serving in that capacity on a vessel of war at the time of his death, of yellow-fever, in Surinam, in 1796. He was honored by burial in the garden of the Governor of that colony.

Mr. Hoitt traces the lineage of his family to John Hoyt, who came from England and was living in 1639 at Salisbury, Mass., of which town he was one of the original settlers. His name appears on all the earlier records of the town, and he is almost the only individual who received all his earlier grants of land at the first division. With thirty other families, he moved west of Powow River in 1645, and formed the West Parish, which, in 1668, became Amesbury. Frequent mention is made of him on records of that town as selectman, constable, juryman, moderator and committee to settle a minister.

The mother of Mr. Hoitt was Mehitable (Babson) Hoitt, daughter of Isaac Babson, of Dunbarton, a graduate of Harvard College, in the class of 1779, and Nelly (Stark) Babson, daughter of Major-General John Stark, of the Continental army, and of illustrious memory.

This family of Babsons descended from James Babson, who, with his mother, Isabel, a widow, came from England to Salem, Mass., where they were residing in 1644. Isabel moved to Gloucester and died in 1661, aged eighty-four. James settled at Little Good Harbor and died December 21, 1683.

Mr. Hoitt remained at home attending the public and select schools and assisting in farm-work till 1842, when, at fifteen years of age, he entered the employ of Mr. Baily Parker, a careful and successful merchant of Pembroke, N. H., and for several years received the advantages of that excellent preparatory school for business-life,—the training of clerk in a country store.

After leaving the service of Mr. Parker he was employed in a woolen-factory by the husband of his eldest sister, J. B. Merrill, Esq., and also became associated with him in the ownership of a general store in his native place. In 1855 he located at Salmon Falls, where for several years he did a brisk and large business in the dry-goods trade, from which ill health compelled him to retire. At the breaking out of the War of the Rebellion, in 1861, moved by the patriotic, martial and heroic example of his ancestors, he promptly supported the war measures of President Lincoln, and by voice and example encouraged enlistments for the Union army, although he was not in sympathy with the new administration, having been a decided and active Democrat. He joined the "Fighting Fifth" Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, and followed its fortunes till the close of McClellan's Peninsula campaign, when he was discharged. He is pensioned for injury received during the famous retreat. After leaving the army he engaged in trade for a while at North Berwick, Me. He next took charge of business, which required him to travel much of the time, and traversed a large part of the United States, taking ample time and pains to examine and inform himself as to objects and places of interest. It has been the fortune of Mr. Hoitt to happen to be present on many remarkable occasions, and to witness many striking and peculiar transactions. For instance, while traveling between Washington and the army on business, he arrived at the scene just in time to be a witness of the destruction of the frigates, "Cumberland" and "Congress," by the rebel iron-clad "Merrimac," and the terrible contest of the latter vessel with the "Monitor." Mr. Hoitt was the first postal agent between Boston and Portland, Me., and when others were appointed he was made chief. For several years he owned and managed a shoe manufactory in Lynn, Mass. After passing through many changes, reverses and successes, in 1880 he did, what he had long desired to do, returned to his native town, and, with two widowed sisters, established a pleasant home at the Parade, on the bank of the Suncook River, where he enjoys the scenes and associations of his boyhood and the society of his neighbors. The old Congregational Church, near his home, the place of his early religious teachings, and where he now is a constant attendant on public worship, has been an object of peculiar regard with him. Once it was saved from destruction by his efforts. Extensive improvements of it have been mostly paid for by himself and sisters. His wife was Miss Martha Seavey, of Saco, Me. They have a daughter, Henrietta Balson Hoitt, born November 26, 1876, and lead a very pleasant domestic life. Imitating the example of his uncle, Colonel James S. Hoitt, of Laconia, soon after attaining his majority, Mr. Hoitt became an enthusiastic member of the Masonic fraternity, and rose rapidly to the degree of Knight Templar. He is a skillful vocal and instrumental musician, and has freely used his talent for the entertainment of his friends and for the promotion of benevolent objects. He may frequently be seen enjoying a part with Barnstead Brass Band, which is almost fifty years old, and of which he became a member nearly forty years ago.

Mr. Hoitt has seen much of the world, mingled with all classes of society and remains a kind-hearted, generous and friendly man.

HISTORY OF BELMONT.

BY ALLAN J. HACKETT.

CHAPTER I.

PREVIOUS to 1859 the section comprising the present town of Belmont was a part of Gilmanton. In 1761 the proprietors of Gilmanton laid off a tract, six miles square, on the Barnstead line. This section was thereafter known as the Lower Parish. The rest of the town was divided into two parts,—Gunstock Parish on the northeast, and Upper Gilmanton, or, as it was called later, the Upper Parish, on the southwest. In June, 1812, Gunstock Parish was severed from Gilmanton and incorporated as a town under the name of Gilford. Previous to this time the term Upper Parish appears to have been applied to the whole section of the town lying north of the Lower Parish; subsequently, it was employed to describe what is now the town of Belmont. It will be so used in this article.

Previous to the division, in 1859, the political and general history of the section comprising the present town of Belmont was so closely identified with that of the rest of the town of Gilmanton that it is obviously impossible, at this late day, to separate the one from the other. The Upper Parish does not appear to have been a very important part of the town. The Lower Parish (now Gilmanton) was settled at an earlier date, and, in addition to this advantage, the founding of the academy, in 1794, formed a nucleus around which, or, at least, in whose near vicinity, was gathered by far the greater proportion of the wealth, culture, enterprise and social distinction of the town. In those old days, before the advent of the manufacturing genius induced settlement on the banks of the streams, the pioneers of civilization courted the hill-tops and piously shunned the valleys. As Mr. Howells' Lady of the Aroostook "wanted to know," so, evidently, these early settlers "wanted to see." They made their homes, for the most part, on the high, slightly ridges, and this habit doubtless explains the otherwise inexplicable fact that nearly all the old highways of the town fully merit the name, being constructed over the loftiest hills, in utter disregard of all questions of economy, with sublime contempt for the consideration of mere distance, and to the annoyance and serious detriment of modern travel.

The settlement of the Upper Parish progressed but slowly. The site of the present village of Belmont remained an unbroken forest for many years after the "Corner," as the Academy village is still called, had become a thriving and somewhat noted settlement. The first store was opened in 1820. In 1834 an association of public-spirited citizens, foremost among whom was Governor Badger, built a brick factory for the manufacture of cotton cloth. This building is still standing, and is used by the Gilmanton Mills Company, to which reference will be made further on. Previous to the building of the factory, the village, if it may be dignified by that name, had been known as "Fellows' Mills,"—the ambitious plural being possibly justified by the fact that the one building was used both as a grist-mill and as a saw-mill. This building, long ago destroyed, is said to have been located on the right bank of the river, below the bridge, and not far from the dam of the present Gilmanton Mills. After the building of the Badger factory, the village grew quite rapidly, and was called "Factory Village," as a compliment to the new industry. This name is still frequently heard. About the time that the factory was built, Governor Badger also built a saw-mill and a grist-mill, at the upper dam, a few rods above the bridge. The saw-mill was situated on the right bank of the stream; the grist-mill on the left bank, and nearly opposite. In the spring of 1852 there was a great freshet. The dam at the reservoir, five miles up the stream, was broken through, and the flood wrought sad havoc in the little village. Several buildings were swept away, and among them the grist-mill. The other mill escaped. In 1876, it was purchased by the Gilmanton Mills Company, enlarged and altered, and used in the manufacture of cases. It was burned in May, 1885. The freshet entailed a severe pecuniary loss upon Governor Badger, and that gentleman dying a few months later, the village experienced no considerable growth, either in size or in general prosperity, for several years.

But the devout settlers did not await the slow development of worldly prosperity before erecting houses of worship. Perhaps, no other feature of the early history of New England is so striking and impressive as the religious zeal of its people. Notwithstanding the bigotry, fanaticism and harshness which so largely characterized the religion of the Puritans, one cannot but admire their devotion,—a devotion so intense, so imperious and so despotic, even, that it subordinated to itself all other emotions and passions, and not only became the controlling influence in their own lives, but was also transmitted, almost as a part of their being, to their descendants. In this respect, the history of one is the history of all, the history of each community, the history of every other community. Worship was as truly a necessity as food or raiment. In none was the religious spirit stronger than among the settlers of the old township of Gilmanston, whose grant was signed by the hand of a Wentworth. They brought, unimpaired, to the wilds of this frontier town that same brave and perfect faith which, a century before, had guided the Pilgrim fathers to the frozen fastnesses of the Massachusetts coast. In the charter of the town, grants of land were reserved for a parsonage and for "the first settled minister." For several years there was no meeting-house, the religious services being held in private houses and in barns. The first church in the Upper Parish was erected at the Province road (so called) in 1792. The members of this church adopted the tenets of the Free-Will Baptist denomination in 1816.

In 1835, it was incorporated by the name of the "Third Free-Will Baptist Meeting-House Society in Upper Gilmanston." Soon after, the society lowered its meeting-house to one story, removed the gallery-pews, and made other alterations. So far as the writer can learn, this building, still in use and in a good state of preservation, is the one that was erected in 1792. If so, it is the second oldest building of the kind in this section of the State. There are no church records to be found previous to 1835; but it would appear, from Lancaster's "History of Gilmanston" (1845), that "Elder John Knowles," one of the founders of the church, was its pastor from 1816 until his death, in 1837. At this time the church was re-organized. Following is the list of pastors from 1837 to the present time: Samuel P. Fernald, 1837-38; John G. Tuttle, 1838; Hugh Beebe, 1845-48; Lemuel Mason, 1848-50; E. G. Knowles, 1850-52; H. F. Dickey, 1852-55; W. A. Sargent, 1855-57; Uriah Chase, 1857-61; H. F. Dickey, 1861-65; J. B. Leighton, 1865-68; O. F. Russell, 1869-70; John Davis, 1871; G. B. Blaisdell, 1872-75; C. M. Emery, 1876-79; S. J. Gould, 1880-83, and J. C. Waldron, the present pastor, who came to the church in April, 1883. The present membership is forty-four.

In 1810, a church, composed of persons who had previously constituted the "Third Monthly Meeting," was established at what is now Belmont village. Lancaster's "History of Gilmanston" states that the meeting-house was built in 1811, but private information puts the date of its erection at 1815. In 1835 the society was incorporated by the name of the First Free Baptist Society in Gilmanston Upper Parish. Rev. Peter Clark was the first pastor, and officiated for more than thirty years. He was a man of very considerable ability, intense convictions and commanding personal appearance. He was one of the most widely-known clergymen in this part of the State, and probably performed more marriage ceremonies than any other man in the history of the town. He was succeeded by Rev. David Moody, about 1841, but continued to preach occasionally after that time. Mr. Moody, who is still living at an advanced age in Sutton, N. H., finally severed his connection with the church in 1851. Other pastors have been, L. S. Wells, J. M. Bedell, 1854-55; H. S. Sleeper, 1856-61; W. H. Yeoman, 1861-64; Almon Shepard, 1864-65; M. Cole, 1865-68; Hosea Quimby, 1869; A. K. Moulton, W. G. Willis and J. Walker, 1870; M. Henderson, 1871; J. L. Sinclair, 1872-76; M. A. Quimby, 1876-81; and T. G. Wilder, the present pastor, whose connection with the church began in 1881. The present edifice was built in 1852. The membership in 1884 was one hundred and six.

A Christian Baptist Church was established at the village in 1839. It was incorporated in 1841. A meeting-house was built in 1840, and was burned in 1867. The present building was erected in 1868. The following have been the pastors: Richard Davis, 1839-42; Josiah Knight, 1842-43; John Burden, 1843; John Gillingham, 1844-47; Samuel Nutt, 1851; Moses Polley, 1852-56; George Osborn, 1858; Abiah Kidder, 1860-72; E. S. Moulton, 1879-81. There is at present no pastor, and the membership is small. These three are the only churches that have ever been organized in the town.

The most distinguished citizen in the history of the town was Hon. William Badger, who was born in 1779. He was the son of Hon. Joseph Badger and the grandson of General Joseph Badger. Both these gentlemen were distinguished soldiers in the Revolution. Joseph Badger (2d) removed from the Lower to the Upper Parish in 1784 and settled upon the farm which has ever since been owned by the Badger family. His son, William Badger, received his education in the common schools and at Gilmanston Academy. He was an active Democrat, and early became prominent in political life. He was representative in 1810, '11, '12; State Senator in 1814, '15, '16, and president of the Senate in the year last-named; justice of the Court of Common Pleas from 1816 to 1820; sheriff of Strafford County from 1820 to 1830; Governor of the State in 1834-35; and Presidential elector in 1836 and 1844. He was also for a long time president of the board of trustees of Gilmanston Academy, and filled other places of trust. As has already been stated, he was chiefly instrumental in building the cotton-factory and other mills at the village, and he may be said to have been the founder of the manufacturing industry in Belmont. He was a gentleman of great business sagacity and enterprise, an honest man and a public-spirited citizen. He died in September, 1852.

Governor Badger's first wife was the daughter of Rev. Isaac Smith, the first settled pastor of Gilmanton. She died in 1810, leaving a son and a daughter, both of whom died a few years later.

In 1814, Mr. Badger married Hannah Pearson Cogswell, daughter of Dr. William Cogswell, of Atkinson. She was a woman of great ability, highly accomplished, and distinguished for her benevolence and public spirit. She came of a family that is very prominent in the history of New England. Among her numerous relatives now living and eminent in political circles, may be mentioned her nephews, John B. Clarke, of the Manchester Mirror, Colonel Thomas Cogswell, of Gilmanton, and General J. B. D. Cogswell, of Massachusetts, and her cousin, "Long John" Wentworth, of Illinois. She died in February, 1869. Her two sons are living,—Colonel Joseph Badger, who lives at the old homestead, and Captain William Badger, U. S. A., at present stationed at Salt Lake City.

Houses, like faces, are either passed heedlessly by, or impress upon the mind a sense of their individuality. Of the latter kind is the old Badger mansion. It needs but a glance at its generous proportions, its wide grounds, its grand old shade-trees to enable one to realize that it has a history. It is situated on a high hill, at a right angle in the road from Belmont to Gilmanton, midway between the two villages. The present building is a large two-story wooden house, fronting the southwest, and was erected by Governor Badger, in 1825. The Badgers have lived on this farm for more than a hundred years. In Governor Badger's time it was the most noted and valuable country-estate in this part of New Hampshire; but the farm has since been somewhat reduced in size.

The house contains many objects of historic interest, but the limits of this article admit only of the briefest reference to a few of them. In the west parlor are the oil portraits of Governor and Mrs. Badger, painted in the early days of their married life. It would be difficult to find a more comely pair. The portrait of the Governor represents a handsome gentleman, with a large, florid, open face, and a suggestion of portliness that gives promise of the three hundred pounds to which he attained later in life. That of Mrs. Badger is one of unusual beauty, and is said, by those who remember her in her youth, to be a faithful likeness. On a table near by, lies the sampler which her young hands wrought eighty-five years ago.

Across the wide hall is the family sitting-room. The walls are hung with paper in rich brown and wood tints, representing a variety of Eastern pictures, comprising street scenes, landscapes and sea-views. This paper cost one hundred dollars in Portsmouth sixty years ago. It is in an excellent state of preservation, and its like is probably not to be found anywhere in the country. Suspended from the wall are the Governor's sword and horse-pistols. The sword was taken from a British soldier near Crown Point, in 1777, by General Joseph Badger, the Governor's father. It has an ornamental silver hilt, and its faded scabbard attests its age. Adjoining this room is the china closet, in which are to be seen the old family china, that was brought from Portsmouth in saddle-bags, and which is excellently well preserved, and the silver tea-service. The latter is massive, and of a beautiful unique pattern. It would tempt the collector of antiques to break one of the commandments, and it is by no means certain that the sin would not be forgiven him.

Ascending to the chambers, the visitor finds in one of them the canopy bedstead and quaint, high-backed chairs, which Mrs. Badger brought from her girlhood's home in Atkinson three-quarters of a century ago. The view from these upper windows is wide and beautiful, ending, as do all westerly views in this part of the town, in the majestic outlines of "lone Kearsarge." Among the objects of interest in the great roomy attic, may be mentioned several tall, stiff military caps, relics of the old "training" days, and a venerable poke-bonnet, that is a prodigy of size and a marvel of ugliness. It is at least two feet deep. The carping critic, who is wont to declaim against the foibles of the feminine mind of to-day, should peer into the unfathomable depths of this ancient monstrosity, and "ever after hold his peace."

Descending by another stairway, the visitor enters the dining-room. The dining-hall of an old mansion is frequently the room richest in historic associations. Here, in this room, the largest in the house, have been entertained a President, a member of the Cabinet, Senators, members of Congress, Governors and State functionaries almost without number. Such a royal banquet-hall would be incomplete without its great clock, and there it stands, a grand old time-piece, aged but not defaced by the more than a hundred years, whose flight it has faithfully recorded, the while its solemn moon-face looked down upon the revelers, and its deep voice, like that of the now silent poet's never silent horologe, kept on repeating,— "Forever, Never!

Never, Forever!"

A few rods south of the Badger mansion, is the early home of the late Hon. W. H. Y. Hackett, a distinguished lawyer, banker and legislator of Portsmouth. Mr. Hackett was born at the Academy village, September 24, 1800, but his parents removed to this part of the town nine years later. He received his early education in the common schools, and at the academy, walking daily to and from the latter institution. He began the study of law in the office of Matthew Perkins, Esq., of Sanbornton, and remained there a year and a half. In 1822 he went to Portsmouth and continued his studies in the office of Hon. Lehabod Bartlett. He was admitted to the bar in 1826, and immediately entered upon the practice of his profession in Portsmouth. In the same year he married Olive, daughter of Joseph W. Pickering of that city.

Mr. Hackett was assistant clerk of the Senate in 1824-25; clerk of the Senate in 1828; representative in 1850, '51, '52, '57, '60, '67, '68, '69; Senator in 1861-62, and president of the Senate the latter year; Presidential elector in 1864; member of the Constitutional Convention in 1876. He was president of the First National Bank of Portsmouth (which was the first national bank organized in the country); president of the Piscataqua Savings-Bank, and trustee of the Portsmouth Savings-Bank. He also held many other positions of honor and trust in the city which was his home for more than fifty years.

Originally a Whig, he naturally joined the Republican party, and for years he was one of its acknowledged leaders. He ranked among the ablest lawyers and most successful financiers of the State, and was a man of strict integrity.

He always retained an active and affectionate interest in his native town. Indeed, so warmly was he attached to "old Gilmanton," that when the bill to change the name of Upper Gilmanton to Belmont was introduced in the Legislature, in 1869, he voted against it.

Mr. Hackett died August 9, 1878, and was buried in the South Cemetery, at Portsmouth. His brother, Charles A. Hackett, occupies the old homestead. A short distance to the east of the house, is the highest hill in this section of the town. The view is beautiful and extensive, and, a few years ago, a signal was placed here for use in the triangulation of the State.

Belmont owes its existence as a separate town to a combination of political convenience and partisan advantage. The political convenience subserved by the separation of the town from Gilmanton, is explained by the fact that the elections were held at the Academy village, and the voters in the upper part of the town were forced to travel a tediously long distance, amounting, in many cases, to eight or nine miles. How serious an affliction this really was, needs not to be explained to the country voter, who has had a personal experience of the difficulties of going to the "March meeting," over roads either blocked by snow-drifts or, rendered equally impassable by the spring "thaw."

The partisan advantage secured by the division of the town, consisted in the gain of two Republican representatives in the Legislature. Under the old apportionment, Gilmanton was entitled to three representatives. For a long time political honors were about equally divided. Victory perched with approximate impartiality upon the banner of either party. But about the time of the formation of the Republican party, the Democrats had gained a permanent control of town affairs. They were in an overwhelming majority in the northern section of the town, while the Republicans outnumbered them in the southern part. A careful analysis of the vote showed that a division of the town on the old parish line, would give the lower section two representatives and the upper section one. The subject was considered for some time, and, in 1859, it took the definite form of a petition to the Legislature for a division on this basis. The bill was introduced into the House by A. H. Cragin, of Lebanon, afterwards United States Senator from New Hampshire. The representatives from Gilmanton were Abraham S. Gale, Joshua B. Pulcifer and Enoch Brown, all of them Democrats, and all opposed to the division. The bill was warmly contested, almost wholly on partisan grounds. It was put upon its passage June 24th. The minority filibustered persistently. Motions to postpone, to adjourn and to lay on the table, were successively made, the roll-call being demanded upon each motion. But the bill passed by a vote of one hundred and seventy-four to one hundred. An equally vigorous, but equally futile opposition was met in the Senate, and the bill was approved June 28th. Following is the first section of the act, defining the limits of the town:

"All that part of the town of Gilmanton contained within the following described limits, to wit: Beginning at the northeasterly corner of said town, where its easterly line is met and intersected by the southerly line of the town of Gilford; thence running in a northwesterly direction, following the division line between said towns of Gilford and Gilmanton, until said division line is met by the parish line, so called, as the same is laid out and described upon the original plan of lots in said town of Gilmanton; thence running southwesterly, following said parish line, until said parish line meets and intersects the westerly line of said town of Gilmanton, as the same now is; thence southerly on said westerly boundary line of said town of Gilmanton to its southwesterly corner; thence easterly on the southerly line of said town of Gilmanton to its southeasterly corner; thence northerly on the easterly line of said Gilmanton, as said line now runs, until it arrives at the point begun at, and the same hereby is severed from said town of Gilmanton, and made a new body politic and corporate under the name of Gilmanton; and that all the territory remaining, which, together with the part severed, constituted the town of Gilmanton, as the same was before the passage of this act, shall be called by the name of Upper Gilmanton."

The act further provided that all demands, dues and funds should be divided between the two towns in the proportion of $6.50 to Gilmanton and $9.50 to Upper Gilmanton. It is suggestive of the change in the relative wealth of the towns, that in the apportionment of public taxes in 1883, Gilmanton was assessed only one cent per thousand dollars more than Belmont.

The first meeting for the choice of town officers in Upper Gilmanton, was called by John E. Page and Isaiah Piper, August 6, 1859. In the following October the line between the two towns was drawn.

But there was soon developed a considerable dissatisfaction with the name of the town. Its length was found to be quite formidable by those who had to write it often, and as there were three post-offices in the town of Gilmanton, there was much confusion in the delivery of the mails. Therefore, in 1869, ten years from the division, the citizens of Upper Gilmanston petitioned the Legislature to have the name of the town changed to Belmont. There was no considerable opposition to the proposed change, the bill passed, and the rechristening of the town was celebrated by a picnic held in Sawyer's Grove, July 5th, the day when the act went into effect.

An amusing incident in connection with this change of name, is to be found in the town records. It appears that a meeting was called on the second Tuesday of November, 1869, "to see if the town would vote to notify Hon. August Belmont, of New York, that the town had been named Belmont, as a mark of honor to him, and invite him to make a donation to the town as a token that he appreciates this action of the town." It further appears from the records that "the prayer of the petitioners was granted." But this language applies only to the action of the meeting. The prayer for a donation has never been granted. The great banker has shown himself surprisingly indifferent to the high honor thus conferred upon him, not having acknowledged the compliment even by the inexpensive formality of a courteous letter. Perhaps he did not fully realize how great the distinction really was. Perhaps it occurred to him that the name, not having begun with him, was not likely to die with him. Possibly he suspected that the idea that the town was named for him, was only an afterthought of the tax-payers. Possibly, he had received similar letters before. But whatever the reason, the hard fact remains that he has never sent his expectant namesake so much as a godfather's blessing, but continues to enjoy and profit by the honor so trustingly conferred upon him, without rendering therefor any equivalent whatsoever!

It should be added, for the good name of the town, that only fifty-eight voters were present at the meeting in question, to share the responsibility for this mendicants' appeal.

The Belmont of to-day is a thriving farming and manufacturing town. By "Fogg's Statistical Gazetteer" (1874), it ranks twenty-first among the towns of the State in the value of its agricultural products. The assessors' valuation for 1884 was as follows: Polls, $31,100; real-estate, $324,874; stock in banks and other corporations, $21,060; stock in public funds, $1,000; money on hand, at interest, or on deposit, $16,452; stock in trade, $8,042; mills, factories and machinery, $21,600; carriages, $918; live-stock, $39,463; total, $464,509. The population in 1880 was 1226; it has probably increased somewhat since that date. Belmont is bounded on the north by Laconia and Gilford; east, by Gilford and Gilmanston; south, by Gilmanston and Canterbury; west, by Northfield and by the Winnepesaukee River and its line of lakes, which separate the town from Tilton and Sanbornston. The surface of the town is broken, hills abounding everywhere except in the southwestern part, where the land is low and level.

The scenery of Belmont is exceptional, even in a section so justly celebrated for its beautiful views. Only the unfortunate lack of railroad facilities can explain the fact that the town is so little frequented by tourists. The western and northern parts of the town do not suffer from this lack, and so boast of several houses for the accommodation of summer guests, the largest and best-known being the "Bay View," near the Laconia line. The views from "Ladd Hill," "Gale Hill" and "Prescott Hill," all within two miles of Laconia, cannot easily be surpassed. No element of a perfect landscape is wanting. In the foreground lies the embryo city of Laconia and Lake Village, flanked on the one hand by the fair lesser lakes of the Winnepesaukee, and on the other by a rugged hill country that finds its fitting climax in the bold outlines of the Belknap Mountains; while to the northward, a beautiful diversity of hill, field and forest, stretches away to meet the great blue mountains, the advance guard of the White Hills, whose higher peaks can be faintly discerned in the far distance. Other exceptionally fine prospects are gained from the summit of "Bean Hill," two miles from Belmont village, and from the hill in "Jamestown," near the village of East Tilton. There are many pleasant drives, the most attractive being the "Province road," the road from Belmont village to Laconia, that to Gilmanston Academy, and the shadowy, leafy "Hollow Route,"—always pronounced "holler out" in the local vernacular. Indeed, beautiful views abound on every hand, and it is the judgment of experienced tourists that the scenery of Belmont is surpassed by that of few towns in the State.

The air is dry and bracing. In point of healthfulness, the town will compare favorably with any in the State. Instances of great longevity are common. Mrs. Eunice Swain Sweatt, who died in 1881, at the age of one hundred and five, was just prior to her death, the oldest person in the State.

The most notable natural curiosity in town, is "Porcupine Ledge," one and one-half miles southeast of the village. The name carries its own explanation. Porcupines are seldom seen at this time, but quills are frequently found. The "Ledge" is really a remarkable place, and well repays the slight trouble which a visit to it involves. Situated in the mountain or lake region, or in any other place largely frequented by tourists, it would long ago have become famous. It consists of a mass of great rocks, roughly tumbled upon each other, and is about one hundred and fifty feet in height. Either the ascent or descent is considerably laborious, but entirely devoid of danger. The summit of the cliff is formed by the great, overhanging "Table Rock," which is not unlike in appearance to its Niagara namesake, and whose shape suggests the probability that the other rocks were torn from its side by some natural convulsion. Directly below is "Pulpit Rock," the largest of the number. It is about seventy-five feet high on its lower side, and almost perfectly perpendicular. The main rock is surmounted by a smaller one, whose fancied resemblance to a pulpit doubtless explains the name. Other points of interest are the "Kitchen," the "Arch," "Devil's Den" and the "Bottomless Pit,"—the last two having no known diabolical associations that would seem to justify their unfortunate names. Local tradition has it that many years ago a gang of counterfeiters here made their rendezvous. The place has long been a favorite resort for those who have known of its charms. It enjoys high favor among the students of Gilmanton Academy, who come hither en masse at least once each year. Indeed, the "Ledge" appears always to have had a subtle but strong attraction for all love-sick youths and maidens, whether fresh from academic halls, or escaping for an hour from the din of factory life. The well-worn path down its steep side is a veritable "Lovers' Lane." The great rocks, could they speak, might repeat many an amorous tale whispered within their inviting shade. For a hundred years Cupid has shared with the fretful porcupine the possession of the miniature caverns, and worked far sadder havoc with his rankling arrows than his bristling cohort with his more visible darts. The scarred trunks of the old trees bear the illegible outlines of many a pair of initials carved in close and suggestive proximity. Let us trust that the early love, thus rudely expressed, has more successfully withstood the ravages of time.

The only village in Belmont, the "Factory Village" of a half-century ago, and the "Fellows' Mills" of a still more remote period, is situated five and one-half miles east of Tilton, six miles south of Laconia and eighteen miles north of Concord, and occupies both banks of the Belmont River, or Great Brook, as it was formerly called. The village has a population of between five hundred and six hundred, or nearly one-half the entire population of the town. Most of the houses are new and freshly-painted, and the general appearance of the village is singularly thrifty and attractive. The principal business block is the building erected by Geo. W. Riley in 1874, and now owned by Haven Grant. This building is forty by sixty feet; the lower part is used for the post office, a store and tenements, the second story for tenements, and in the third is the principal hall of the town. The First Free-Will Baptist and Christian Churches, referred to elsewhere, are handsome buildings. In connection with the former is a beautiful cemetery, the largest in town. Among the more attractive residences may be mentioned those of M. Sargent, Jr., J. P. Cilley and T. E. Clough. The business directory is as follows: Postmaster, C. O. Judkins; groceries and dry goods, D. S. Hoyt & Co. and Bean & Smith; watches and jewelry, F. K. Johnson; meats and provisions, A. T. Bean; papers and periodicals, G. W. Hunt; millinery, Mrs. R. G. Hoyt; confectionery and cigars, C. O. Judkins; drugs, E. C. Bean; hotels, Brown's Hotel (A. W. Brown), Belmont House (Ira Mooney); Gilmanton Mills, hosiery, M. Sargent, Jr., agent, D. W. Gale, clerk; lawyer, E. P. Thompson; physician, S. A. Merrill; justices, W. C. Wells, C. A. Hackett, A. P. B. Currier, I. Piper, J. W. Wells, E. P. Thompson, D. W. Judkins, I. Mooney, A. J. Hackett, E. C. Bean, C. E. Moody, J. B. Matthews, M. H. Philbrick, F. K. Johnson; livery stable, C. H. Aikens; lumber, J. L. Allen, J. M. Folsom, N. D. Garmon; blacksmiths, Abbott & West; builders, Cyrus Norris, Edgar Willard, Andrew Phillips, Dayton Hunkins; barbers, G. Woodward, H. J. Fuller.

Belmont has no railroad, but excellent mail and passenger facilities are afforded by the Tilton and Gilmanton line of stages, Davis & Son, proprietors. The first stage leaves the post-office at 8 A. M., and connects at Tilton with the 9.30 train for Boston over the White Mountains Division of the Boston and Lowell Railroad; returning, leaves Tilton on the arrival of the noon train from Boston, and reaches Belmont at 1.30 P. M. The second stage leaves Belmont at 1 P. M., connects with the 2.30 train for Boston, leaves upon the arrival of the up train, about 4 and arrives at Belmont at 5.30.

A charter for a railroad between Tilton and Belmont was granted by the Legislature of 1883, but work upon it has not yet been begun.

A branch line of the Wimpesaukee Bell Telephone Company runs through the town to Gilmanton Corner and Gilmanton Iron-Works, the central office in Belmont being at the post-office.

It will doubtless surprise not a few of the readers of this article to learn that here, in this little inland village, far removed from any railroad, and but little known to the general public, is located the largest manufactory of hosiery in New Hampshire. Such, nevertheless, is the case. The Gilmanton Mills, of Belmont, turn out a larger annual product than any other hosiery-mill in the State. These mills are situated on the west side of the principal street of the village, just south of the road to Tilton. They occupy the site of the old Badger mill, and this building, erected in 1834, is still standing and forms one of the group. After Governor Badger's death, in 1852, the mill property was successively owned by several parties, and the business conducted with indifferent success. Previous to 1865, the mill was used in the manufacture of cotton sheeting. At that time, M. Sargent, Esq., of Lake village, bought it, put in new machinery, and began to manufacture hosiery. In 1870, Hon. Amos Lawrence, of Boston, became the owner, and from this date the mill entered upon a new era of prosperity. In 1875, a joint-stock corporation was formed, with a capital stock of one hundred thousand dollars, Mr. Lawrence being elected president, and M. Sargent, Jr., clerk of the corporation. Mr. Sargent has been the local agent for twenty years, and ranks among the most successful and efficient mill managers in New England. As has been already intimated, at the time of Mr. Lawrence's purchase there was but one building, the old Badger mill. This is a brick building, eighty feet by forty, and three stories high. Since 1870 several buildings have been added. These are a brick factory, one hundred and thirty-five feet by sixty; dye-house, one hundred and ten feet by thirty; three large store-houses, a machine-shop and the office. There is also a library connected with the corporation for the use of the operatives. The water is carried to the mills in a canal one thousand feet long, ten feet wide and five feet deep, and is conducted on to a giant turbine-wheel, through an iron penstock one hundred feet long, with a head of thirty-three feet, furnishing one hundred horse-power. There is also a steam-engine of fifty horse-power, for use as an auxiliary, there being about two months in each year when the water supply is insufficient.

The average number of operatives at the Gilman-ton Mills, is two hundred, most of whom are of American birth. The annual product is two hundred thousand dozen; annual consumption, six hundred bales of cotton, and one hundred thousand pounds of wool. There are also used twelve hundred cords of wood, and one hundred and fifty thousand feet of lumber, each year. The power is supplied by the Belmont River, a small stream rising in Gilman-ton, and tributary to the Winnepesaukee. The supply of water is carefully husbanded in three reservoirs, situated three-quarters of a mile, three miles and five miles from the mills, and called, respectively, the Badger, Sargent and Sawyer reservoirs. The Sawyer reservoir was constructed by Governor Badger, and contains fifty acres; the Badger reservoir was built by the immediate successors of Governor Badger in the ownership of the mill, about 1854, and contains twelve acres; the Sargent dam was built by the present company in 1871, at a cost of three thousand dollars, and the flowage is seventeen acres.

A freight team is kept constantly on the road between the mills and East Tilton. There are eight very good tenement-houses owned by the corporation.

It hardly needs to be added that the Gilman-ton Mills constitute the leading industry of the town, nor can it be estimated how great a proportion of Belmont's prosperity is due to the presence and existence of this thriving corporation. Its owners and managers are courteous and public-spirited gentlemen, and their relations both with their employes and with the people of the town in general, have always been most cordial and friendly.

Farrarville is a small collection of houses, situated on the river, one and a half miles northeast of the village. Formerly, there was a mill here for the manufacture of cotton batting. The site is at present occupied by N. D. Garmon's lumber mill.

Following is a complete list of the officers of the town from the division, in 1859, to, and including, the present year:

1849.—Representative, John E. Keenan, Lynn B. Fells, Jos. Nathan Farrar, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; S. Lowell French, school committee.

1849.—Morrison Rowe, representative; Lynn B. Fells, Perley Farrar, Stephen L. Taylor, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; S. Lowell French, school committee.

1851.—Morrison Rowe, representative; Stephen L. Taylor, Perley Farrar, John W. Wells, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Daniel M. Page, school committee.

1852.—Joseph Badger, representative; John W. Wells, Isaac Bennett, Weymouth, Isaac Bennett, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Daniel M. Page, school committee.

1853.—Joseph Badger, representative; John W. Wells, Isaac Bennett, John M. Roberts, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Joseph Plummer, school committee.

1854.—Joseph M. Folsom, representative; Isaac Bennett, John M. Roberts, James C. Gilley, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Joseph Plummer, school committee.

1855.—Joseph M. Folsom, representative; Isaac Bennett, James C. Gilley, John M. Roberts, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Edgar A. Rowe, school committee.

1856.—No representative; Joseph V. Weymouth, James S. Weymouth, Henry W. Gilman, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; William A. Breckin, school committee.

1857.—Napoleon B. Gale, representative; Joseph V. Weymouth, James S. Weymouth, Henry W. Gilman, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; William A. Breckin, school committee.

1858.—Napoleon B. Gale, representative; James S. Weymouth, Henry W. Gilman, Joseph V. Weymouth, selectmen; N. D. Garmon, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Charles W. Knowles, school committee.

1859.—Benjamin B. Lamprey, representative; James S. Weymouth, Daniel T. French, James G. Gale, selectmen; William M. Leonard, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Charles W. Knowles, school committee.

1860.—George W. Rundlett, representative; Daniel T. French, Nicholas D. Garmon, James G. Gale, selectmen; William M. Leonard, clerk; Daniel E. Hatchelder, treasurer; Ellbridge G. Ladd, school committee.

1861.—Moses Sargent, representative; Nicholas D. Garmon, Daniel E. French, James G. Gale, selectmen; William M. Leonard, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Ellbridge G. Ladd, school committee.

1862.—Charles B. Gale, representative; Nicholas D. Garmon, Edgar A. Rowe, Dudley W. Jenkins, selectmen; Isaac Mooney, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; Herman C. Weymouth, school committee.

1863.—Joseph Sanderson, representative; Edgar A. Rowe, Dudley W. Jenkins, Charles E. Moody, selectmen; Charles E. Clough, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; George B. Blandish, school committee.

1864.—Langdon Ladd, representative; Edgar A. Rowe, Dudley W. Jenkins, Charles E. Moody, selectmen; Charles E. Clough, clerk; John W. Wells, treasurer; George B. Blandish, school committee.

1865.—Nathan Chase, representative; Charles E. Moody, Charles B. Rowe, Jewett E. Maxfield, selectmen; Charles E. Clough, clerk; Timothy E. Clough, treasurer; Charles E. Clough, school committee.

1866.—Jesse S. Towle, representative; Jewett E. Maxfield, Charles B. Rowe, Nicholas D. Garmon, selectmen; Charles E. Clough, clerk; Timothy E. Clough, treasurer; Nelson F. Hill, school committee.

1867.—Arthur W. Brown, representative; Charles B. Rowe, Nicholas D. Garmon, Jewett E. Maxfield, selectmen; Charles E. Clough, clerk; Timothy E. Clough, treasurer; Nelson F. Hill, school committee.

1868.—William A. Blandish, Joseph Plummer (non-resident), representatives; Calvin J. Sanborn, Dudley W. Jenkins, James G. Gale, selectmen; Charles E. Clough, clerk; Isaac Piper, treasurer; Allan J. Heckert, school committee; Charles A. Hackett, Charles W. Knowles, Nelson F. Hill, supervisors.

1869.—Calvin J. Sanborn, Dudley W. Jenkins, James G. Gale, selectmen; Walter C. Wells, clerk; Isaac Piper, treasurer; Allan J. Heckert, school committee.

1870.—Ellbridge G. Folsom, representative; Dudley W. Jenkins, James G. Gale, Calvin J. Sanborn, selectmen; Walter C. Wells, clerk; Isaac Piper, treasurer; Calvin J. Sanborn, school committee.

¹The first election under the biennial system was held on 6th November, 1875, necessitating the choice of two representatives that year. Also, the law providing for the choice of supervisors was not in effect that year.

per, treasurer; Edmund S. Moulton, school committee; Charles A. Hackett, John C. Pearsons, John S. Young, supervisors.

1851.—Isaiah Piper, Horace C. Woodward, James G. Cate, selectmen; Edwin C. Bean, clerk; William H. Shepard, treasurer; Selden J. Gould, school committee.

1852.—Allan J. Hackett, representative; Isaiah Piper, Horace C. Woodward, Alpheus L. Bean, selectmen; Edwin C. Bean, clerk; William H. Shepard, treasurer; Selden J. Gould, school committee; Charles A. Hackett, John S. Young, A. P. B. Currier, supervisors.

1853.—Isaiah Piper, Horace C. Woodward, Alpheus L. Bean, selectmen; Frank K. Johnson, clerk; William H. Shepard, treasurer; Walter H. Philbrick, school committee.

1854.—Allan J. Hackett, representative; Isaiah Piper, Pike Davis, Samuel N. Jewett, selectmen; Frank K. Johnson, clerk; Edwin P. Thompson, treasurer; Walter H. Philbrick, school committee; Charles A. Hackett, John S. Young, A. P. B. Currier, supervisors.

1855.—Pike Davis, Samuel N. Jewett, William H. Shepard, selectmen; Frank K. Johnson, clerk; Daniel W. Gale, treasurer; John M. Sargent, school committee.

But few of the present citizens of Belmont have held important offices outside of the town, or can be said to have become especially prominent in public life. Joseph M. Folsom was appointed bank commissioner by Governor Weston in 1871, and again in 1874. John W. Wells was county commissioner from 1871 to 1874. Charles A. Hackett has several times been the Republican candidate for Councilor and Senator; but, living in a Democratic district, has failed of an election. Moses Sargent, Jr., was the Republican candidate for Senator in 1880; but for the same reason was defeated. Napoleon B. Gale, president of the Belknap Savings-Bank, of Laconia, and representative from Laconia the present year, is a native, and, until lately, a resident of Belmont. His brother, Hazen Gale, who died in 1882, was a man of marked eccentricities. It is related of him that he somehow acquired a strong aversion to Laconia, and declared that he would never visit that town again. Although living within a few minutes' walk of the town line, he faithfully kept his promise until his death, more than thirty years later, except on one occasion, when his presence was required as a witness at court, and the sheriff would not respect his scruples. Captain William Badger, to whom brief reference has already been made, was born in 1826, graduated from Dartmouth College in 1848, and for several years was engaged in manufacturing. At the outbreak of the Rebellion he joined the Fourth New Hampshire Regiment, served as captain of Company D, and was honorably discharged in June, 1864. In February, 1865, after the death of Colonel Bell, he was appointed colonel of the Fourth Regiment. At the close of the war he joined the regular army, and still remains in the service, with the rank of captain. He is an accomplished soldier and a gentleman of ability and culture. He is engaged upon a history of the towns of Gilmanton and Belmont, which promises to be one of the most valuable and complete works of the kind in the State.

Such, in brief, are some of the more salient features of the past and present life of the town of Belmont. No attempt has been made to give a detailed biographical history. The narrow limits of this article have precluded such an attempt, and, even with a broader opportunity, the task would be neither easy nor grateful. The story of the simple daily life of a small country town is of little interest to the great, bustling outer world. Its local celebrities, its personal achievements, its struggles, its hopes, its disappointments, the thousand nameless factors in its existence,—these must therefore be found in home traditions and fireside legends, not in the printed page.

The local Warwicks, that have played upon this lesser stage the self-same dramas of political strategy and intrigue, which, cast in larger parts, have shaken nations; the village Hamplens, who were wont, on a summer eve, to discuss the great questions of the day, with a fire, vigor and rugged eloquence that might well be transferred to a wider forum; the mute, inglorious Miltons, who have thought the poems they could not put in words, as they followed the plow in its rocky course through the autumn fields; the hoary Nestors, that, on winter nights, stirred the young blood to quicker throbs, as they told of thrilling deeds in the olden time,—who shall write the history of these? And there is that other and still more sacred history, common to every town, but all the more pathetic because so common: those never-to-be-forgotten summer days, when nameless heroes, soon, alas! to sleep in nameless graves, rushed, heedless of the whitening fields, to fill the "quota" of the town; and those weary months that followed, when the lonely and heart-sick wives and mothers, sisters and daughters, waited and ever waited, longing for the tidings they might better never hear,—who may write such history as this, or who would write it if he might?

Loyal, honest, faithful, earnest people, patiently filling up the measure of their uneventful lives, neither squandering nor wanting, sparing in the midst of plenty, but having abundance in their rigid economy, bound together in that unspeakably close fraternity which characterizes every rural community, rejoicing in each other's joys and grieving in each other's griefs, mutually helpful and sympathetic, alike ready to attend the marriage-feast or to go forth under the cold winter stars to perform for the dead those last offices which here are never left to stranger hands,—their history, like that of the people of every other New England country town, lives in the hearts of those who know their worth.

HISTORY OF CENTRE HARBOR.

CHAPTER I.

THE town of Centre Harbor lies in the northern part of the county, and is bounded as follows:

On the North west and North, by Grafton County; Northeast, by Carroll County; South, by Meredith and New Hampton.

This town was incorporated December 17, 1797, having been set off from New Hampton.

For several years previous to the incorporation of the town the locality of the present village was known as "Centre-harbour." Moultonborough harbor being east and Meredith harbor west, made this the centre harbor, and from this source the town derived its name.

The village of Centre Harbor is located on Lake Winnipiseogee, and commands a charming view of the lake and neighboring hills. It is somewhat celebrated as a watering-place. There are two churches in this town—Congregational and Free Baptist.

The first petition for the incorporation of this town was made in June, 1788, and signed by Benning Moulton and fifty others. This petition, however, was not granted, and, in 1797, a second petition was presented to the General Court, which was granted, and the town incorporated, as mentioned above, December 7, 1797. The signers of this petition were,—Ezekiel Morse, C. Sturtevant, John Pain, John Hawkins, Chase Robinson, Jesse Sturtevant, John Sturtevant, Hosea Sturtevant, Amos Pain, Jr., Stephen Hawkins, John Knowles, A. B. Glines, Nehemiah Lee, Benning Moulton, Daniel Page, Moses Morse, Hugh Kelsea, Joseph Kenney, Daniel Norris, Robert Kelsea, James Tebbets, Caleb Towle, Perez Sturtevant, James Little, W. Robinson, W. Pain, William Berry, Jonathan Robinson, Joshua Pain, Jeremiah Towle, Pelham Sturtevant, Joseph Moulton, J. M. Pain, Abel Morse, Moses Kelsea, Smith Cram, Joshua Norris, Benjamin Sturtevant, John Pain, Jr., Isaac Morse, James Towle, Wadleigh Cram, Jos. Senter, E. Chamberlain, C. Hawkins, Stephen Kenney, Amos Pain.

The First Town-Meeting was held March 12, 1798, and the following officers were elected: Winthrop Robinson, Captain Jesse Sturtevant and Hugh Kelsea, selectmen; Winthrop Robinson, clerk.

The following is a list of clerks, selectmen and representatives to 1886:

1799.—Hugh Kelsea, James M. Greenleaf, Pelham Sturtevant, selectmen; Hugh Kelsea, clerk.

1800.—Hugh Kelsea, Pelham Sturtevant, Daniel Norris, selectmen; Hugh Kelsea, clerk.

1801.—Moses Morse, Charles Little, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1802.—Hugh Kelsea, Benning Moulton, Daniel Norris, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1803.—Benning Moulton, David Norris, John Clement, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1804.—Benning Moulton, Hugh Kelsea, Daniel Norris, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1805.—David Norris, Charles Little, Moses Morse, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1806.—David Norris, Charles Little, Moses Morse, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1809.—Hugh Kelsea, Jonathan S. Moulton, Joshua Norris, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1810.—Hugh Kelsea, Jonathan S. Moulton, Jonathan M. Pain, selectmen; Moses Morse, clerk.

1811.—J. S. Moulton, Jonathan M. Pain, Hugh Kelsea, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1812.—Hugh Kelsea, J. S. Moulton, Richard C. Wiggan, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1813.—J. S. Moulton, John Knowles, James Huntress, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1814.—J. S. Moulton, Jonathan M. Pain, William Clark, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1815.—J. S. Moulton, Jonathan M. Pain, William Clark, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1816.—J. S. Moulton, Jonathan M. Pain, William Clark, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1817.—J. S. Moulton, Jonathan M. Pain, William Clark, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1818.—J. S. Moulton, Daniel Norris, William Clark, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1819.—J. S. Moulton, Daniel Norris, John H. Moulton, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1820.—J. S. Moulton, William Clark, Daniel Norris, selectmen; J. S. Moulton, clerk.

1821.—Hugh Kelsea, William Clark, John Coe, selectmen; John Coe, clerk.

COL. JOHN HALE MOULTON.

History is the résumé of the lives and events which are to-day among the things of the present, to-morrow those of the past, and in history mention should be made of those whose personal qualities, business enterprise and moral worth have contributed in some way to the wealth, knowledge and welfare of the community in which they lived, and to this number belongs Colonel John Hale Moulton, who was born at Centre Harbor, N. H., June 24, 1795, and died at his residence, Moulton House, June 3, 1885, aged ninety years.

Colonel John Hale Moulton was of the sixth generation in descent from the emigrant John and grandson of General Jonathan and son of Benning and Sally (Leavitt) Moulton. (See biography of Hon. John C. Moulton.) After a common-school education, he entered his brother's store in his native town and continued with him until 1812, when he was employed as a clerk in Hampton for three years. Returning to Centre Harbor, he resumed his old position in his brother's employ, and also had the opportunity of adding to his education by receiving instruction from that able teacher, "Master" Dudley Leavitt, and of that period of school-time he ever retained pleasant memories. Three years after, 1818, he established himself in trade and continued merchandising for ten years. Naturally energetic and enterprising, he sought other channels of business, and, in 1828, purchased a mill privilege in an adjoining town, erected a saw, grist and shingle-mill, and also owned and conducted a freighting-boat on Lake Winnepesaukee, with which he conveyed his lumber to market. In 1836, Colonel Moulton again established himself in Centre Harbor as a merchant, and, in 1848, he purchased the hotel which has for so many years borne his name. Assuming the duties of its landlord, for many years he was known to the community and elsewhere as an active and popular host, possessing the courteousness and affability of the inn-keeper of the old school. As an evidence of his active and enterprising spirit, when he was over seventy years old, he rebuilt the hotel in a style commensurate with the increasing demands of summer travel. He continued in business, managing his store and farm in connection with other labors, until 1880, when he retired from active life.

In 1832, Colonel Moulton married Susan Sargent, daughter of Rev. Huntington Porter, of Rye, N. H. Mrs. Moulton is a descendant of two old colonial families of consequence, Huntington and Porter, and is a lady of winning personal presence and amiable character. Her father, Rev. Mr. Porter, was an able and noted minister of the gospel, and one whose counsel was often called upon in important affairs. Colonel and Mrs. Moulton had three children—Franklin Hale (died aged two years), Oliver Porter (died in infancy) and Susan Huntington, who married Smith F. Emery. They have two children—Caroline Porter Emery and Alice Huntington Emery. The family reside at the Moulton House, which Mr. Emery has conducted for some years.

Before he attained his majority, in 1815, Colonel Moulton enlisted in the New Hampshire Light Infantry. He was much interested in the service, and, with his directness and ambition to excel, attracted the attention of his superior officers, and he was promoted, successively, as captain, major and, in 1832, received his commission as colonel, and was considered an able officer.

In politics he was an uncompromising Democrat, and always manifested a lively interest in party affairs, and he performed the duties of the many public offices to which he was called with credit to himself and honor to his constituents. He represented Centre Harbor in the General Court in 1847 and 1848, and again from 1852 to 1856, and was county commissioner from 1858 to 1861. In 1819, when comparatively a young man, he was chosen selectman, and was often re-elected, until 1862, when he was made chairman of the board and retained the position until 1868. He was moderator for years, and repeatedly served as town treasurer, and for over half a century, from 1824 to 1881, he held a commission as justice of the peace. He also held the office of deputy-sheriff of Stratford County for five years.

In early life Colonel Moulton was a believer in Universalism, but, later, changed his views and subscribed to the "Articles of Faith" adopted by the Congregationalists, although he never became a communicant with the church in Centre Harbor. A prayer written by him was found among some of his papers in his store in 1864, which breathes the true spirit of Christianity.

Colonel Moulton possessed a strong and vigorous mind, a very retentive memory and great firmness of character. His intellect remained clear and his faculties almost unimpaired, so that he took an active interest in public affairs until within a few days of his death. He was fond of reminiscences, and his vivid portrayments of the manners of other days gave enjoyment and profit to many. He had a kind greeting and pleasant word for every one, and in the deeper and holier relations of the home circle he exemplified the highest elements of a Christian nature, and he left an impress by his strong character on his native town that shall not speedily be effaced.

JOHN COE.

The Coe family came to this country from Suffolk-shire, England, where they had resided for many generations. The earliest notice of them which can now be found is in Fox's "Book of Martyrs," which states that "Roger Coe," of Milford, Suffolk-shire, was burned by Queen Mary, September, 1555, at Textford, in that shire. Little is known of the family till the removal of Robert Coe to this country. In the authentic family record he belongs to the first generation. In the records of the custom-house, preserved in the State Papers Office, Westminster Hall, London, the name is written "Cooe." The oldest original signature found in America is in the town records of Jamaica, L. I., and was written February 14, 1663, "Robart Coe." Robert Coe was born in Suffolk-shire, England, in 1596. With his wife, Anna, and their three sons, he sailed from Ipswich, Suffolk-shire, April 10, 1634. They reached Boston the following June, only six years from the date of the first settlement in the Massachusetts colony. Robert Coe settled in Watertown, near Boston, and in 1635 he moved to Wethersfield, Conn. On the 30th of October, 1640, Mr. Andrew Ward and Mr. Robert Coe, with about twenty other planters, commenced a settlement in Stamford, Conn. In 1644, Robert Coe and several others formed the first settlement at Hampstead, L. I. In 1652 he made a settlement at Middlebury, (now Newton), L. I. In 1656 he, with others, commenced a settlement in Jamaica, L. I. He continued to be one of the most active and prominent men in public affairs till about 1672, at which time he was seventy-six years old. The time of his death is not known.

John Coe, of the seventh generation from the above-named Robert Coe, was the son of Rev. Curtis Coe and Annie Thompson, and was born at Durham, N. H., January 15, 1797. His father moved to Newmarket, N. H., with his family when John was about nine or ten years old. A few years thereafter John engaged as clerk in a store kept by his brother Ebenezer, at Northwood, N. H. After faithful service for several years, gaining the confidence of all who knew him, he became acquainted with a gentleman who owned an unoccupied store at Centre Harbor, N. H. Mr. Coe visited the place, then very thinly settled, leased the store and, returning, bought at Portsmouth, N. H., a stock of general merchandise, ordering it shipped to Dover, thence to Alton Bay by teams, thence to Centre Harbor by boat propelled by oars and sails. On his arrival at Centre Harbor, soon after, he found his goods at his store. He at once began to take an interest in public affairs of the town, holding in succession nearly all the offices of trust. Being town clerk at the time of his marriage, he was, according to the law at that time, obliged to rise in church and declare his own intentions of marriage. He married Lavinia T. Senter, eldest daughter of Samuel M. Senter, one of the first settlers in the town which afterward took his name.

After about eight years of active, successful business as a country merchant, he removed to Durham, N. H., where he engaged extensively in ship-building. During his stay at Centre Harbor he became convinced of the need of a temperance reform, and banished from his table and places of business all intoxicants. Upon entering his new business of ship-building at Durham, he found that it was a long established custom for the men employed in the ship-yards to have liquor dealt out to them at regular hours of each day. True to his convictions, he determined to break up that custom in his yard, and gave notice that no more "grog" would be furnished or allowed on the premises. His men all refused to work without it, knowing that he had a large amount of work that must be finished at a given time or he would lose heavily. Not heeding the advice of his friends, he stood firm on the side of temperance, going in the night to Dover and engaging a new crew of men, who came to his yard at sunrise the next morning. His work went on and no more intoxicating liquor was ever allowed on his premises.

About 1832 he moved to Dover, there residing till 1835, when he came back to Centre Harbor, where he still owned much real estate, and bought the "Senter House" of its first proprietor, Samuel M. Senter, and began a very successful career as a hotel proprietor, and, with his estimable wife, enjoyed a reputation as landlord and landlady second to none in the State. As the business increased, he made additions to the hotel until, instead of forty feet frontage, he had a house with one hundred and twenty feet front, and comparatively large additions in the rear. In 1846, leaving his son Curtis S. in charge of the "Senter House," he removed to Boston and leased the Marlboro Hotel, on Washington Street, which he kept four years. Returning to Centre Harbor, he sold the "Senter House" to his son, C. S. Coe, and repaired and modernized the house he built when he first came to Centre Harbor, thinking to retire from active business; but, being largely interested in real estate at Jamaica Plain and Newton, for several years he spent most of his time in Boston, returning to his family and country home to spend the Sabbath, which he always, during his whole busy life, regarded as a day of worship. In early manhood he made a public profession of religion and united with the Congregational Church at Centre Harbor, bearing his full share of the expenses of the church and society and then making up all deficiencies in the finances at the close of each year.

During most of his life he was much interested in agriculture, owning and tilling several large farms. It has been aptly said: "He is a public benefactor who makes two blades of grass to grow where but one grew before;" so will the main street of Centre Harbor village, bordered on either side by its fine elms and maples, render praise to Mr. Coe, who planted them.

In 1869 Mr. Coe visited the South on business, spending several weeks in and around Natchez, Miss., and was much pleased with the hospitality of the Southern people. Returning home, he was taken ill and died, April 2, 1861.

RANDALL S. KENESON.

Randall Seavey Keneson, son of John and Polly (Jackson) Keneson, was born in that part of Eaton now Madison, N. H., December 14, 1811. John Keneson was a man of great versatility of talent, of much mechanical ability, and, with his trade of watch and clock making, carried on a boot and shoe manufactory in Eaton, his native place. He married, February 8, 1801, Polly, daughter of Phillip and Mary (Place) Jackson. They had nine children,—two sons and seven daughters. Mr. Keneson was a Whig in his political views, and, although the town was largely Democratic, he often received more than the vote of his party when nominated for office. He was a man worthy of the confidence and esteem which he received in a large degree from his fellow-townsmen. He was town clerk for twenty-five years, and also held a commission as justice of the peace for a long period, and served in various minor offices. He was a Free-Will Baptist in religion, and an active and uniform member of that church. He was of medium size, social, made many friends, and always took an intelligent interest in the welfare and growth of his native town. He was born May 18, 1784, and died March 24, 1838.

Randall, from his earliest childhood, had a great aptitude for mechanics, "had rather frame a slate at home than use it at school," and, not altogether willingly, received the instruction which was given him for several years at the public schools, and learned the jeweler's trade and custom boot and shoe making, remaining with his father until he was twenty years of age. His mechanical skill soon made him more than ordinarily proficient in these avocations, so he went to Haverhill and worked at custom shoe-making with good success for one season. His health failing, he was obliged to give up labor for a year. After the recovery of his health he went to Dedham, Mass., where he was employed in a broadcloth-factory for four years. He was diligent and industrious, devoted the time not required in his duties at the factory in repairing clocks, watches, etc., and in this way, as his habits were good and his manner of living prudent and economical, he was enabled to save enough money for a capital for future business operations. He then returned to Eaton, and went to work on his father's farm, and also, in connection with his agricultural labors, fitted up a small shop and established himself as a jeweler.

Mr. Kenson married, first, January 9, 1838, Almira, daughter of Moses Morse, of Centre Harbor. She died August 9, 1842. They had two children,—Elvira (Mrs. George B. Blake) and Newell, who died when an infant. He married, second, Miranda S., daughter of Isiah and Deborah (Mason) Forest, of Eaton where she was born, April 8, 1816. They had one child, Adelaide H. (Mrs. Lewis R. Veasey).

Mr. Kenson continued in business in Eaton until August, 1852, when he removed to Centre Harbor, and has since been a resident of that town. Here he devoted himself exclusively to his jewelry trade, and carried it on until 1880, when he retired from commercial transactions, having, by his frugality and honest endeavors, acquired a competency. His mechanical ingenuity has always been of good service to him; for instance, when needing any work done, he could do it himself and in the best manner. His uniform kindness and pleasant manners have won for him many friends. His faithfulness in the performance of his work has secured for him the respect and esteem of all. Democratic in politics, he represented Centre Harbor in the legislative term of 1878-79, and has also served in town offices. A plain and unassuming man, he has not sought official position, and such offices as have been conferred upon him have been given without his solicitation, he having never asked a man for his vote.

Mr. Kenson is a member of the Congregational Church, and is always in accord with everything tending to improve and elevate the community in which he resides, while his conservative nature prevents him from going precipitately into the advocacy or support of any measures which are not grounded in reason and practicality. Kind in his domestic relations, a valued friend and a prized and estimable citizen, he worthily stands high in the esteem of his townsmen.

HISTORY OF GILFORD.¹

BY REV. J. P. WATSON.

CHAPTER I.

THE historical matter connected with, and the occurrences that have taken place in, the territory included at different periods within the limits of the town of Gilford largely mingle with those of other towns associated and near, and of other civil organizations remote and seemingly dissociated.

The continuous and complete course of the annals of the town will cover some of the early records of Gilmanton, from which it was detached, and preface largely the history of the recent town of Laconia, increased by detached portions herefrom, and also supplement that of Meredith, which has contributed to the domain of both. The boundary line of Gilford has been so frequently changed for enlargement and diminution that it shares with other towns much of their enterprise and honor and history. Its location on or near an important river and other waters gives it special importance, not only as the centre of various industrial enterprises and professional practice, but as related to older divisions, involving questions of rightful possession and jurisdiction.

By the charter from King James, in 1606, Virginia extended from the thirty-fourth to the forty-fourth parallel of north latitude, and hence included the greater part of New Hampshire territory, and comprehended that part in which Gilford is situated. By a subdivision of this grant into North and South Virginia, the former was limited by the fortieth and forty-eighth degrees of north latitude, and hence included all of New Hampshire territory, and Gilford was in North Virginia. This division of the territory granted by the royal patent, which at first was assigned to certain dignitaries of Bristol, Exeter and Plymouth, England, was subsequently committed to forty men of distinction and means, who constituted the Council of Plymouth, whose official business was the "Planting, Ruling and Governing of New England in America." This council was constituted November 3, 1620, and they made grants of minor sections to other particular parties and organizations in subsequent years.

Though the Duke of Lenox was the first-named of the Council, and though there were also several others higher in the list, yet Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Governor of Plymouth, in Devonshire County, England, after 1604, appears to have been the most active and the leading man of the Council, and was elected their first president. Also Captain John Mason, of London, and, after the peace of 1604, Governor of Newfoundland, as well as of Portsmouth, Hampshire County, England, was elected to fill a vacancy in the membership, and made secretary of the Council.

He made the first purchase from the Council March 9, 1621. It was a tract of land thence known as Mariana, and impossible of boundary. It was to extend from the Naumkeag to the Merrimack River, and from their mouths to their head-waters, and to be inclosed by a straight line from the source of the one to that of the other river, which line would cut the whole grant asunder, and at the same time both include and exclude certain territories or portions. August 10, 1622, Mason and Gorges jointly made a purchase of land, supposed to be directly and contiguously on the north of Mariana, or Mason's first purchase, and extending from the Merrimack to the Sagadahock, and back to the "Great Lakes and the River of Canada" (i. e., Winnepesaukee, Champlain and the St. Lawrence).

This was termed Laconia; and this was the first conveyance of the territory of Gilford. The Company of Laconia, consisting of Mason, Gorges and others, was formed, and endeavored to effect settlements on the tract purchased, which they did at Dover in 1623. That part of Laconia bordering on Lake Winnepesaukee was not reached and settled at this time, though considered as the most desirable and valuable on account of its supposed mineral deposits. Seven years later, John Wheelwright and others took a deed from four Indian sagamores of land bounded by the "Merrimack and Piscataqua, extending back to the falls of Nuichawannock, in the Piscataqua, and to the Pawtucket falls, in the Merrimack, and thence 20 miles N. W. into the woods; and thence N. E. to the first-mentioned point, Nuichawannock Falls." This deed evidently did not comprehend Gilford territory; but on November 7, the same year, 1629, Mason took a new grant of territory, less in extent, but more definitely bounded,—viz.: "From the mouth of the Piscataqua to 60 miles in the course of the river; and from the mouth of the Merrimack to its farthest head-waters; and so forward up into the land westward until 60 miles were finished, and thence to cross overland to the end of the 60 miles accounted from the Piscataqua River, including the Islands within 15 leagues of the shore." This evidently included the territory of Gilford; though it was not certain whether the line connecting the points designated on the rivers should be a straight line or a curve line, maintaining at all parts a distance of sixty miles from the sea. The lands included between the arc and chord thus drawn were in dispute, and were in part in Gilford, and claimed in Mason's right. The line subsequently was determined as a straight line, running from the point on the present State boundary sixty miles from the mouth of the Piscataqua (which was several miles north of its source, and in the town of Eaton), crossing the lake and Long Island, passing over Mount Major, of the Gunstock range, and terminating in the town of Rindge, on the Massachusetts boundary. Hence, the eastern part of Gilford was afterwards assigned to Mason's heirs, and called Masonian shares, when the remainder was bought of said heirs.

In 1632, the lake and its shores were visited by explorers from Portsmouth, but no settlements were made or marks left. Mason died in 1638, and willed his claims and property to various heirs. The disputed jurisdiction of Massachusetts over land included in the after-grant to the proprietors of Gilmanton, being found in part in Gilford, was apparently decided in 1652, when commissioners appointed by the General Court of the Massachusetts Bay Company were sent to establish the bounds agreeable to their construction of their charter. They claimed that the charter carried a strip of land on the left bank (north and east side) of the river, three miles in width, and extending to its source, at which point a line laid off due east and due west should mark the northern limit of their chartered lands. The extension of this line eastward, as well as westward, was the claim of the Massachusetts Bay Company, but was rejected by the claimants to the territory on the north side of the river, and was finally decided in their favor. But, agreeably to that interpretation of their charter, the said court appointed, on the 27th of May, 1652, a commission to settle the north line of their domain, and Captains Simon Willard and Edward Johnson were put in charge of this business. They procured the services, as surveyors, of Jonathan Ince, a student at Cambridge, and John Sherman, sergeant of Watertown, and these, following the guide of certain Indians, employed to direct the route, ascended the river to Aquadocton, the outlet of the lake, which was declared to be the head of the river (now the Weirs), and there they took astronomical observations, and determined the latitude thereof to 43° 40' 12". This point was indicated by inscriptions on a large boulder in the middle of the outlet. This inscription, made by drills, consisting of the date, the initials of Governor Endicott, and those of the surveying party, etc., may be seen at the present time, though the action of the elements for two hundred and thirty-three years has rendered them somewhat illegible. This bound was unknown, or unidentified, for many years and till 1846. From this point three more miles were to be included, north of the river, so three minutes more were to be allowed, making the utmost limit to be at 43° 43' 12" north latitude, and said to be "out into the Lake." As the course from the mouth of the river was westerly, and the charter said three miles north of the river,—i. e., on its left bank,—and the course at the last was nearly due north, it was, and is, a question where the limit should fall. If it be determined by a perpendicular line three miles in length, maintained throughout the entire course, then it would be three miles nearly due east of the Weirs, and off Smith's Intervale, or a little east of Governor's Island. If due north is taken, which seems to be implied by the addition of three minutes for the three miles, then the boundary line will pass through a point either three miles due north of this inscribed stone,—i. e., near or on Meredith Neck,—or three miles north of the point three miles east of the stone,—i. e., in the broad expanse northeast of Governor's Island and towards Bear Island.

These observations were made August 1, 1652, and report was made to General Court, October 19th. Jonas Clarke and Samuel Andrews, shipmasters, were sent to mark the same latitude on the Atlantic shore, and determined it to fall on the northern part of Upper Clapboard Island, in Casco Bay, near Portland. An east and west line drawn through these two points of the parallel 43° 43' 12" was to constitute the border line of the province of Massachusetts Bay; but this demarkation did not abide time and contentings, as it was based on a forced construction of the patent letter. Gilford territory, which was cut by it from near the Province road and Cotton's Hill and over Liberty Hill and down Gunstock Valley to the Intervale, was not permanently dismembered, and assigned to the jurisdiction of the Massachusetts Bay Company. At Aquadocton there was originally about three feet fall, which has been overcome by flowage in consequence of the dam at Lake village, formerly Folsom's Mill. While these lands, bordering on the upper Merrimack and on the South Lake shore, from Aquadocton southward and eastward, had evidently qualities valuable, and calculated to induce occupation and cultivation, and Aquadocton itself was one of the best fishing-grounds, yet, in opposition to all prospects, but for sufficient causes, this part of the common domain remained unused and undeveloped for more than a full century after 1652. These places were known, to be sure, but scarcely more than as a thoroughfare of the aboriginal wanderings, and assemblings, and migrations, and as feeding-places. The settlers of Piscataqua made early reconnaissance of these regions, and as early as 1632 visited, in their course, the lake and the White Mountains, and penetrated even to Champlain. They evidently marked the place a desired resting-place and there built a block-house as early as 1722, "at the Lake," as it is supposed, farther east than the bounds of Gilford, probably in some part of Alton, or at Merry Meeting Bay, of after fame.

From the four quarters of the land there seemed to meet here, as in a centre, the great trails or pathways of the Indians, living in all directions. And Aquaducton was, even before, a place of no mean repute, or an unheard-of retreat of the savage wilds.

From the south came up the Penacooks, the Nashuas and various remoter tribes from Naumkeag and remoter parts of the Massachusetts Bay territory. From the west and northwest the Iriquois and St. Francis and others, through the valley of the Connecticut, Baker's River and the Penigewasset. From the north, over the lake, and from the valley of the Ossipee, the Saco and Androsgoggin, come the Pekwauketts, the Ossipees and others. From the east came up the Cochecons and various tribes of Maine. Here was their general rendezvous, and here councils of war were held, tribal feasts enjoyed, questions settled and disputed, and here issues, now unknown, were made and destinies determined. The summits of the Gunstock range were the outlooks over all this region, and from them to the Ossipee, Chocorua, and the greater, more distant northern peaks and lesser southern hills, were heralded the decisions of the contending and the counselling savages. The Indian wars that marked that century had much of their scenes laid in this locality. The exceeding great hazard in effecting progressive occupation and settlement kept the few actual settlers closely compacted in five or seven towns that constituted the province of New Hampshire, viz.: Dover, Portsmouth, Exeter, New Castle, Hampton, Oyster Bay and Great Island.

The changefulness of the mother-country at this time also had its effects, both directly and indirectly, on the expansion of the colony. The uncertainty of the sovereign personnel, and the spirit of the administration at home, and the changing figures of appointed magistrates and Governors here, made everything unsubstantial and problematic, and destroyed the vital germ of enterprise. The commonwealth lasted scarcely a decade from the execution of Charles I., and Charles II., for a quarter of a century from 1660, held the throne, but, in regard to these colonies, only to appoint six or seven successive Governors in the provinces of New Hampshire and Massachusetts. The short reign of James used three more Governors, closing with the tyrannical and hated Edward Andros, William III., in a reign of a little more than one decade, constituted and removed five more; and the distressful King William's War vexed the whole country and distracted and paralyzed the energies of the feeble band that had set down on the coast and the Piscataqua, but had their eye and hope on Aquaducton. Queen Anne's dozen years' reign and the succession of George I. brought not much better times; so that when Samuel Shute assumed the Governorship of the two provinces jointly, in 1716, there was scarcely any sign of Aquaducton's being redeemed from its wilderness state, or the condition of the older settlements being much improved. Indians periodically assembled on the shores of the lake, and men from Massachusetts visited the Weirs for a winter's stock of fish, but the glebe was yet unbroken, and the forests pathless, save by the trail of the red man.

By the appointment of John Wentworth as Lieutenant-Governor of New Hampshire, to act under and with, and, in certain contingencies, instead of, Governor Shute, of Massachusetts Bay province, on June 15, 1716, the interests of New Hampshire, and especially of the undeveloped places about the lake were revived, more carefully looked after and attended to. The decadence of the spirit of expansion and enterprise that followed the putting of New Hampshire under Massachusetts' protection and control, in 1689, and during the troublous times of William and Mary's reign, seemed to have reached its lowest point about the time of the accession of Queen Anne, in 1702, or of her death and the commencement of the reign of George I., in 1714. Those who had suffered loss and endured hardships in the earlier wars, from the time of King Philip's, in 1674, and especially in that of King William, in 1688-90, now begin to claim some indemnification or reward. This is sought in grants of unoccupied lands. The paralyzing effect of the massacre at Dover, and the ruin of Salmon Falls, and the absence of that master-spirit of Major Waldron, now dead, determined that the tide of progress would not set up the Cochecon Valley to the shores of the lake and Aquaducton, though this would have been the most natural course of expansion. Nor did the contingencies of the disputed limitations and jurisdiction of the Massachusetts Bay Company favor the extension of settlements up the Merrimack, the second most natural path of progress in occupation and improvement. Hence, the third and most unlikely movement was made from Exeter into the wilderness by the route of no river valley, but along the highlands. Hence, in 1727, these claimants, numbering nearly two hundred, a charter is granted to them of all the land left, from the corner of Chichester, northwest of Barnstead, and northeast of the north line of Canterbury (then including London and Northfield), and extending to the lake and river, and abutting on both Barnstead and the unincorporated land eastward, afterwards known as the New Durham Gore, since Alton.

The occupation of this land was now considered feasible, since the Province Council and Assembly had caused a fort or block-house to be built and garrisoned on the shore of the lake. This was ordered in 1722, and was to be fifty feet square, constructed with timbers eight inches square, having two wings, or flankers, and capable of giving accommodation to a garrison of one hundred and fifty men, and was to be provisioned duly. It was to be located near the bank of the lake, where there is an opening into the lake, and on the southeast side; which language, in its first statement, would seem to indicate Aquadocton, but, in its other words, appears to refer to Alton Bay, and probably the eastern side. The purpose of building and arming this block-house was declared to be to "annoy and check the Indians of this region," and so secure quiet to the settlers. Hence the grantees and actual settlers of Gilmanton had thus a defense in their rear, as far as it concerned some of the most unfriendly tribes in this region; and, therefore, the fear of molestation was measurably removed. The proprietors were not all from Exeter, but some of Portsmouth; many of the settlers first sat down temporarily in the southern part of the grant, and afterwards re-located in the northern section, or Gilford. The territory was divided into two hundred and fifteen shares, and severally apportioned to one hundred and ninety-two shareholders, besides the Masonian heirs; and the public and governmental reservations were five shares.

The proprietors were not, to a great extent, actual settlers, yet their names very largely correspond to those known in the history of the plantation. Ninety different names appear in the original list of proprietors, among which that of Gilman leads with twenty-four, viz.: Andrew, Caleb, Daniel, Edward (1st and Jr.), Jeremiah, John (Sr., Jr., 3d and Captain), Jonathan, Joseph, Nathaniel (Sr. and Jr.), Nehemiah, Nicholas (Sr., Jr. and 3d), Peter, Robert, Samuel (1st and 3d), Thomas and Trueworthy. Hence the name Gilmanton was most natural. The charter bears date of May 20, 1727, and in the thirteenth year of the sovereign, George I., and had three conditions, viz.: 1st, the settlement of seventy families within three years each in a separate house, and each having cleared three acres fit for tillage, and having paid all assessments. 2d, a meeting-house shall be built within four years. 3d, three shares shall be appropriated for public use, viz.: One for the ministerial support, one for minister's residence and one for support of schools; providing, however, that no Indian war prevent the settlement, and in such event, granting three years from the close of such war.

The consideration of this deed or title was the quit-rent of one pound of flax annually forever, if demanded, and due the second Tuesday of March. Also all pine-trees, twenty-four inches in diameter, were reserved, under the act of Parliament, for the construction of ships in the royal navy, which trees had been marked and registered by a surveyor, appointed first in the time of William, and agreeably to the provincial statute of 1708, by the approval of Queen Anne.

The line of boundary, as defined by the charter, was a straight northwest course, or, more accurately, north, 47° west, and from the southwest corner of Barnstead till the Merrimack waters were reached, about twelve and three-eighths miles, which terminal point was on the shore of the bay, a little south of the outlet of Great Brook and one and a half miles southwest of Burley's bridge, at East Tilton. The other line ran six miles on the Barnstead line, or, more accurately, six miles and one hundred and twenty-two rods, passing one mile, ninety-five rods beyond Barnstead northeast corner, as now established. This course was east, 43° north (said to be northeast), and thence the line was to run northwest (north, 47° west) two miles (two miles, sixty-five rods), and thence north (north, 1° west) seven miles to the lake,—i.e., seven miles, forty-eight rods. Thence the shore of the lake and the river, or series of bays, was to be the terminal margin, not including the islands off shore in the whole course. This tract contained about eighty-five thousand acres of land, about one-third of which constitutes the original town of Gilford as set off.

At the expiration of the three years, in 1730, the settlement of the seventy families had not been effected, and the proprietors petitioned for extension of time. It is not alleged that the condition of outbreaking Indian was formed the basis of this neglect and needed prolongation of time; but the country was far from being tranquil during this period. The charter, still unpaid for, was held by the clerk of the Council; yet they made provision for its redemption, and for laying out the plant and making it accessible by a chosen and cut or cleared-out pathway or road; but this work was delayed another year.

The principal names connected with the survey and much of the early doings of the proprietors were those of Edward Gilman, who seems to be the accepted surveyor, and Jethro Parsons and Oliver Smith. These, with five other men as assistants, began the bounding of the town June 14, 1731, and simply ran the easterly line, as defined by the words of the charter. This took twelve days, as the line was about sixteen miles long, and lay over the mountains. Beginning at a beech-tree, they ran six miles to a birch, then two miles to another beech, and finally reached a hemlock at the pond. With these four trees, only one in Gilford, the domain is located. One hundred and fifty years might not have wrought the decay of the beech and the hemlock (perhaps the birch should have gone); but tradition identifies them not, nor are seen the initials inscribed on them.

The next year a plan of the town and the laying out of lots were ordered, and these lots were to equal or exceed the number of proprietors. Five ranges of home lots were laid out in tiers, resting on the southwest base line, containing about forty acres each, and extending to the base of the mountains and nearly to the extent of the present town of Gilmanton. These were drawn by the proprietors for actual settling or for disposition to whomsoever they could induce to take up the land and improve it for themselves.

October 18, 1732, these lots were drawn and each one began to take measures to have the conditions of the charter carried out.

In 1733 it was decided to lay out a second division of lots, and to build block-houses at the extreme southeast part, and also at the extreme northwest, or Aquadocton, which is said to be "fishing-grounds," and also to examine the soil there, and see if it be good and fit for a settlement.

An opinion had already obtained that this part of the grant was more valuable and more desirable for a settlement than the lots already laid out. This proposition was not immediately carried out, but was renewed the three following years with variations in the committee to accomplish it.

In 1736 the committee performed their assigned work, and in eleven days from the 14th of June, cleared a pathway from Epsom to Gilmanton and built two block-houses, one at the southeast corner of the first division of lots, and the other at the Weirs. These were the first houses built on the grant. As they were simultaneously constructed, the one in the present Gilmanton and the other in Gilford, the two towns may be said to be of equal age. The former was eighteen feet square and the latter fourteen feet; and these, with the other and larger one at the eastern part of the lake, constituted a triangulation of the region for fortification and protection, and for aggression. The land on the lake-shore and river border was pronounced to be of good quality and suitable for settlement; and, therefore, its laying out was recommended and urged by the committee and demanded by others. The lay and quality of the land inclined the judgment of the committee, that these lots should face the river, or west; and as a detached section, should be erected in ranges extending from Aquadocton towards the Canterbury line, and not connecting with or reaching the first division.

A boom was now made for the settlement of the north part of the town, and two important privileges were offered, viz.: First, the choice of the lots to be laid out in the second division should not be in the arbitrary manner of drawing them by lot, but the proprietors, or settlers, could choose their shares together and at either end of the division, and so avoid being too scattered and exposed. Second, a bonus of forty shillings from each proprietor was offered to the first twenty or more settlers, who would within five years commence settlement, and would clear and break up two acres of land. This was an extension of time, two years, and a reduction of the quota of land to be cleared by one acre, as compared with the proposals made for settling in the first division; and, besides, the premium was not inconsiderable, as two pounds from each of one hundred and ninety-two proprietors meant a little fortune in those days, to a mere settler, or husbandman. It would seem that these inducements should have been sufficient. But they did not secure acceptance; and the next year resort had to be made to the General Court to extend the time of settlement, and for authority to collect taxes of the proprietors. Already nearly two hundred pounds had been expended in surveying, building block-houses and cutting pathways, and several proprietors were in default of payment, and their shares had to be sold to satisfy the assessments made.

In 1738 a committee, increased to the number of twelve, was constituted to lay out these lots, which they did in June, by the assistance of twenty other hired men, in ten days from the 20th of the month. The first four days were employed in clearing a way from White Hall, or the first block-house, to the Merrimack River, presumably at Aquadocton. The lay or route of this pathway was sketched, but with some indefiniteness; and hence different opinions as to its exact location may be entertained. As the first cleared pathway, or road, in the town, its position is of importance. The surveyors' returns say that it lay "from White Hall to Loon Pond, one mile and a half; thence to Block-House Pond, a mile and a half; thence to Third Camp Meadow, four miles; thence N. W. by N., to Skeller's Meadow, three miles; and on the same course, five miles, to the Pond." With the want of expressed direction in the first three courses, or stages of advance, we are to make special use of the definiteness of direction and distances mentioned in the last two stages. Reversing the course of northwest by north, and laying off five miles, the meadow land in the valley of the Miles River will be reached, near the estate of the late David Brown, Esq., or that near John Foster's and Jonathan Morrill's, above the fowage. Then, laying off three miles in the same direction (nearly), the pond at the summit or the head-waters of the Suncook will be reached (or, from Foster's and Morrill's meadow, the margin of Young's Pond). Loon Pond is easily identified, and there remains only Block-House Pond for identification. A radius of four miles from Third Camp Meadow, considered as at the head-waters of the Suncook, would very nearly reach the Reservoir Pond, or the small pond a little to the east of it, and at the head of Mill Brook; or, measured from Young's, would reach Pickeren Pond. Either of these three ponds may have been referred to as Block-House Pond. The only other plausible identification of points and direction of the route is, that Pickeren Pond, near Parsonage Hill, represents Block House Pond; and the vicinity of Young's Pond, the Third Camp Meadow; and the upper Gunstock Valley, south of Gilford village, to Esquire Weeks' estate, that of Skeller's Meadow; and that thence the way crossed Meeting House Hill to the Weirs; and this, though answering well as to distances, does not agree as to the directions mentioned in the returns. As the first division of lots had already been laid out, it would be natural to follow them as far as they extended, and so avail themselves of the advantage of the surveyor's marks and partial clearing of pathways; and this would be in the direction of Young's Pond, and the pond at the summit, or head-waters, from which point Aquaducton, or its immediate vicinity, could be sighted, and its bearing taken; and hence at this stage first mention is made of direction; and the course thence is made as direct as possible.

With this way cleared, the communication between the first and second divisions was made easy; and these thirty-two men now divide themselves and their work into four parts. Two parties lay out the lots in five ranges,—in all, numbering one hundred and seventy-seven lots.

For encouragement to settle on these, not only might the settlers have the choice of their lots together, but they should receive forty shillings annually from each proprietor,—a generous offer indeed.

The third house was built by one section of this party "for their shelter," but its site was not described, nor does tradition locate it.

Another section of the party spent six days in "looking out a convenient place for a way to Canterbury." This second way in the territory was distinct from the one from Epson, viz White Hall, and ran parallel with the ranges, along the margin of the river at first, and then south through the upper part of the town, or Upper Parish.

When it seemed so assured that the town would be speedily settled, and the union of New Hampshire and Massachusetts under one civil administration had kept somewhat in abeyance the conflicting claims to lands on the margin of the river, so that without hesitation, question or protest, the second division of lots was laid out and offered to settlers, being nevertheless all comprehended in that part of the domain claimed by Massachusetts, and the settlement of the boundary in 1741 had given advantage and impulse to the projects and interests of the proprietors, there seemed unaccountably a stay in proceedings, as neither the town, or parts of the town, realized progress.

Then the unsettled state of affairs in Europe culminated in the declaration of war between England and France, and brought on the dark night of conflict in the American colonies, paralyzing all schemes. So that from 1738 to 1748 all things remained stationary, or were retrograding. Two cleared ways and three houses were all of Gifford and Gilmanton. On the cessation of hostilities, in 1749, there were attempts made to revive the interests of the scheme, and, as preparatory to it, a committee, with twenty men, by order of the proprietors, spent eleven long summer days in renewing the metes and bounds and repairing the houses and adding one new house at Third Camp Meadow (the claim to which is not determined either in favor of Gifford or Gilmanton, as its site is not settled) and renewing the way cut ten years before, which by disuse, had become almost untraceable and useless.

But the time of peace was too short to admit of much progress, and a second war deferred for another decade all advancement; and this, despite new and generous offers held out to pioneers. To at most forty settlers, who, within one year, should build houses and bring under cultivation three acres of land yearly, there was proffered a premium of fifty acres of land additional from the undivided land, and this to be doubled at the end of six years, as an additional bonus.

The only immediate effect of this proposed bounty was some felling of trees in 1750 by parties from Penacook, on land chosen and intended for a homestead, but which was soon quit by reason of the renewal of hostile demonstrations. Indeed, so low did the enterprise run, that twenty-one shares were to be sold to pay arrearages of unpaid taxes. The sale of Mason's claim to twelve men of Portsmouth further complicated and embarrassed matters pertaining to the settlement of the town.

To overcome this effectual obstacle, the uncertainty of valid title, a way must be devised. A compromise was made whereby these purchasers, called the heirs of Mason, quit-claimed the remainder of the territory for eighteen shares in equality with the original proprietors; these shares to be reserved in guaranty to them and exempted from taxation till occupied. With this obstacle removed, a new bonus is offered of one hundred pounds old tenor, in eight quarterly instalments, and two forty-acre lots of land, to the first twenty settlers, and, when there should be ten families, to support a minister and also to build a saw-mill. It would seem that such liberal conditions should have secured a rush for the prize. But dangers and war are more powerful than all gain.

The contract with the Masonian heirs involved or required the survey and laying out of their eighteen shares and the making of a plan of the town, which was done in 1752 by one Nathan Sanborn, under the direction of a committee whose chairman was Oliver Smith. This was the third division, or third laying out of lots, and was made, as the contract specified, from the extreme eastern side of the grant. They were laid off in two ranges running from the lake-shore on the north, and extending to the margin of Young's and Lougee's Ponds, and quite to the north-eastern limits of the first division of forty-acre lots. These lots were to be equal in quantity and quality to the shares of the original proprietors, and they varied in size from two hundred to four hundred acres.

Thus, having the two vexed questions settled,—viz, that of title and that of jurisdiction,—the way seemed prepared to easily carry out the plans for improvement of the grant. But there remained still one, and an abiding, hindrance,—that of exposure to Indian cruelties and attacks. The block-houses and fort did not prove sufficient for defense. The borders of the lake were no ordinary or insignificant locality. The drama of Indian conflicts and struggles was conspicuously laid on this battle-ground and rendezvous.

And another and extremely severe conflict was at hand; or rather the former one, supposed to have ended in 1748, broke out anew in 1754, and ended not till the most stubborn of these foes (the St. Francis tribe) was broken, in the year 1759, and peace was secured.

Indeed, the fear and reluctance of men to throw themselves too far from a base, into the unoccupied and exposed places, was not relieved till the various colonies began to combine and make common cause. The action of the congress of commissioners and their declaration in 1754, and the consequent successful conduct of affairs in the five following years, did much to assure men who would undertake enterprises in the new parts. But the second French War employed and exhausted all the reserve forces of the country, and no one turned his thoughts toward the development of his interests in unsettled lands till after 1760. Although, to any sagacious eye the northern part of Gilmanton had the most promising future, and, with its mighty motive-power in the three water-falls at the Weirs and Lower Weirs (Lake village) and Winnesquam (Laconia), was destined to outstrip the other sections, yet the settlement came up, and that slowly, from Epsom, through the cleared way, to the southeast part of the grant. Here the appearance of a settlement was effected in the last days of 1761. But, in order to effect this, increasingly generous offers had to be made.

The fourth laying out of lands was made of that lying contiguous to the first division of forty-acre lots, and was disposed into six ranges, and two ranges of gores, these equal in number on each side of the first division; and these, of one hundred acres each, (though varying somewhat), were offered in pairs to go with each home lot to the first forty settlers. A grist-mill and a saw-mill were also promised to be erected by the proprietors for the settlers as soon as there were ten families.

A great inconvenience and impediment to progress at this time was the want of proper roads. The one "cut" and twice afterwards "cleared," from Epsom to the Weirs, twenty-six miles in extent, and also others, were not much more than mere foot-paths or trails, capable, however, of use to riders on horse-back, which mode of travel and transportation was then most common (even the iron-work of the first saw-mill and grist-mill being brought into town in this manner). A road for wheels was first partially made to the borderline of the town in 1759, but was impassable for ox-teams in 1762. The town had to make their road through the unsettled portions of the town next to it, in order to find access or approaches to its own main.

Water communication in places bordering on the lake and river in a measure supplied this defect, and travel in this way was there common. The first improvement of land was not in the northern or second division. The two families that came in 1761, the eight that were added in 1762, and even the total of forty-five found there in 1767, comprising two hundred and fifty individuals, all took their choice of lots in the lower part of the grant, though some of them subsequently moved into the upper section, or Upper Parish. It was not till 1777 and 1778 that families made permanent location in the northern part. Contrary to reasonable expectation, and strange to say, one hundred and fifty-five years elapsed between the settlement of Dover and that of Gilford, though only less than forty miles lay between their boundaries, and a natural roadway extended directly from one to the other, via the lakeshore, and, moreover, though peculiar advantages offered inducements to expansion in this very direction. So, also, upwards of sixteen years has marked the progress of only ten miles in occupation northward from White Hall.

The laying out of the first parish, in 1761, in the southeast corner of the town, six miles by six and a half, almost identical, in position and extent, to the present town of Gilmanton, and the providing for preaching there, and the building of a saw-mill and grist-mill, respectively, in this and the following year, all by the proprietors for the benefit of the settlers, seemed to act unfavorably to the wider dispersion of the inhabitants, and to the development of the upper and better lands, and the using of its natural resources. This effected concentration of privileges and interests there, formed the germ of a distinct municipality, and gave rise to a counter and competing centralization, which resulted, after fifty years of municipal unity, in the dismemberment and separate civil existence of Gilford, and, in the end, of Belmont. The special adaptation of the upper part of the territory to agricultural purposes, and of its great motive-power in the immense volume of water furnished by the lake to manufacturing, as contrasted with the insignificant streams on which the first proprietors' mills were placed, only to be shifted or to go to decay, evidently pointed to future separation and growth. Men of keen foresight plainly saw this to be inevitable and wisely acted upon the evidence; and, first of all, after Samuel Jewett, two men, Captain S. F. Gilman and James Ames, in 1778, chose their lots here and pitched.

The way to this step was prepared, in a large measure, by the building of the Province road, eight years before. To facilitate the settling of new towns to be granted, and those already granted, but not improved (for many waited long for inhabitants), the General Court laid this road in 1770, to extend from Portsmouth to Canada; and its lay was diagonally across Gilmanton, from the First Division and settled portion to the narrows in the river as it enters Winnesquam, just below the Falls, in Gilford, at later times called Meredith Bridge.

The General Court imposed on the towns the building of the road through their domain. The inhabitants of Gilmanton were opposed to the extension of the road into the upper part of their territory, and officially refused to construct it. It cut the lots diagonally and much to their damage, while the laying out of the town provided for a regular system of roads and made the lots rectangular. The expense was considered excessive and burdensome, while they were struggling to provide for other things, as schools and churches and the necessary roads to reach their individual lands and residences. It was also unfavorable to concentration and prosperity in the neighborhood already formed, to induce the forming of distant and rival neighborhoods; so that the project was not viewed with favor. But the General Court ordered the road to be built by contractors, and the cost, three hundred and thirty-one pounds, was assessed on the town. Thus a passable highway was opened, in 1770, into Gilford, and, very wisely, to the part where the power was. This assured a settlement there and growth.

About the same time Samuel Jewett settled above the Falls, at the terminus of the Province road. It is claimed this was in 1777.

The first two to locate afterwards were farmers, and, with good judgment, made their choice in the vicinity of the Intervale, the one at the southeast and the other at the southwest angle of that rich tract of alluvial land.

James Ames settled near the house built and occupied by Ebenezer Smith, Esq., and Captain S. F. Gilman at the head of the spur of the valley or meadow land, near the heads of Black Brook and the Meadow Brook.

About this time Levi Lovit made a temporary residence near the outlet of the Lily Pond, and opposite the house afterwards and lately occupied by Increase W. Davis.

Abraham Folsom began improvements at the Lower Weirs, and though his residence was in that part which, till recently, belonged to Meredith, and, later, Laconia, yet his enterprise was for the interests of Gilford, and his mill (grist-mill) was the one necessary accommodation of the first settlers.

Daniel Stevens located on the Gilford side of the river, and his house, still standing, was for many years the only house at that place on the Gilford side.

Soon after these came Malachi Davis, Samuel Blaisdell and Lowell Sanborn, the first two of whom settled near the residence of Captain Gilman, and the last of whom at the extreme end of the range, on the lake-shore.

Esquire Benjamin Weeks, who came into the lower part of the town in 1768, led a party into the upper section and located at the western base of Mount Major, in 1787, where there afterwards dwelt a large community of that name. He was a leading man, and large land-holder, and successful in business.

The population of the town increased rapidly after the first few years. There are no returns extant that show the number of actual residents within the limits of that portion of Gilmanton which was set off to constitute the town of Gilford at the time of such detachment living there. But by the census of 1810 we find that the whole town then contained 4338 inhabitants; and by the census returns of 1820 it had then 3752 remaining in the old town, and Gilford had 1816; so that it is probable that about 1500 inhabitants were set off to form the new town. The little band of 250 in 1767, of 775 in 1775, or of four at the beginning of 1762, had a remarkable growth. And the increase in the second division was not less rapid than that of the first, or of the whole, which numbered only 775 in 1775, two years before the first families entered the upper part and actually made a beginning of settlement there. The census of 1790 gives a population of 2613, and that of 1800 makes it 3752. As above stated, in 1810 it was 4338, and probably in 1812 the aggregate was not less than 5000.

The list of tax-payers of Gilford in 1813, the first one made after the incorporation, contained 294 names, including a few non-residents. The assessment of that year was for $1297.98, comprising State tax, $182.68; county tax, $67.35; and school tax, $492.98; and town tax, $465.73.

They spent nearly as much for schools as for all other town expenses, and maintained ten schools about six months each.

Captain James Follet was the first collector, and had been several years before for the Fourth Collector's District of Gilmanton, or the Second Division.

The first Board of Selectmen were John Smith, Thomas Saltmarsh and John Gilman. In 1806 there were in the Fourth Collector's District, nearly contemporaneous with the future new town, 166 assessed persons; and the amount assessed was $643.60, out of $2803.92, assessed on the whole town, showing that the district had not then attained to the fourth part of the taxable value of the whole. In 1808 this section had 192 tax-payers, including a few non-residents, and was levied upon for $616.62 in the total of $2574.42, or about one-fourth part. The list of assessed had increased in 1810 to the number of 296. The inventories of these years show that but few acres of land had been improved by each settler, they having been extensively engaged in constructing their buildings, and were now distracted by the opening of another war with England. Born or inaugurated in the warlike season, the public affairs were conducted somewhat in a spirit of contentment. Not only political, but even ecclesiastical affairs witnessed many a battle, long drawn out and most bitter. A child of strife, nursed in conflicts, she grew valiant in war. With room for free exercise of her arms over the adjacent waters on the north and the west, she was prepared to meet any assailant from either quarter; and, trusting, in her munition of rocks, she attended to domestic improvements without fear or distraction; and the result has been not otherwise than laudable, as the following exhibit will plainly establish:

The Personnel of the Early Settlers.—As an article of the prescribed extent for such a work as this does not admit of a book, or even full chapter, of genealogies, it will be sufficient to append a few words on the persons and characters of those early citizens who constituted the body politic in its first years of separate and corporate existence. And for this purpose will we use the list of tax-payers in the first year of assessment. Thirty-five years had doubtless witnessed some falling out as well as the gathering in of a body of inhabitants, so that our notices may be wanting in some names of parties who had come and gone already, and some who had not yet been placed on the list of tax-payers, though really resident.

Daniel Avery appears to be among the number as early as 1790, and he commenced trade here at that time, at the bridge, the terminus of the Province road. He afterwards enlarged his business and built a factory and ran it many years, and he was one of the heaviest tax-payers at the first year of the town's separate and independent management, and even before that date. His family remained there for many years, but are not represented in the place now by that name. James and David Ames are among the earliest on the ground. James settled at the foot of the hill in the road, now discontinued, near Esquire Ebenezer Smith's, and David located where Richard Dame lived, now owned and occupied by William W. Watson. They appear to have made a good beginning, but long since the families have been reduced and scarcely represented among us. The family is not, however, extinct, but have mostly removed elsewhere.

Jeremiah Bartlet came early to Gilford and took up land, about 1790, at the west base of Gunstock Mountain, and was a successful farmer and an upright, respected man. He lived to an honorable and ripe old age on the lot he first occupied, and in his later years was afflicted with deafness and a troublesome wen on the neck, which increased in size as his years advanced. His exemplary piety was characteristic. He had two sons and several daughters. One married John Jewett. His sons were dealers in stock and for a time drovers. The line of descent is not traced by numerous posterity, but the homestead is still occupied by lineal descendants, some of another name. Samuel Bartlett was a citizen also at the same time. Rev. Robert Bartlett moved into town in later times, with a large family, occupying the Osgood place, on Liberty Hill, and supplying the Universalist pulpit for a time, and dying only a few years ago at his daughter's, in Lake village, at an advanced age. He was a man of good ability and of activity in his early life, and had some good positions before coming to Gilford.

The name of Bean, so common in Gilmanton, was also well represented here in the persons of Elijah, James, Solomon and John, and later by Henry, Joel, Chas. and True. The first of these settled in the southern part of the town and the others in the northern. Their families are still represented, though not by great numbers of the same name, but by changed names.

The family of Bennett was among the first of the assessed, and the names of John, John, Jr., John and Winthrop appear on the first year. They settled in Chattleborough and near Liberty Hill. Some of the name in after-years, as Harrison, was of honorable mention in public affairs and educational departments. The family is still represented by a few.

The Blaisdell family was a prominent one from the very first years. Samuel Blaisdell settled north of and near to Captain Gilman, at the Lily Pond. He worked at blacksmith work, and several of his sons afterwards carried on the same business. His sons were William, John, Daniel, Enoch, Aaron, Philip and Samuel, all men of intellectual and executive abilities. He exercised his talents as a lay preacher, holding meetings at his own house before a regular service was established or meeting-house built. Perhaps there was some lack of agreement of his doctrinal sentiments and those current or entertained by many in the vicinity. William, the oldest son, was later representative of and preacher to the Order of Christians, or, as they are sometimes called, Christian Baptists. He had good talents and education and was promoted in civil offices. Others of the family exercised limitedly their gifts in lay preaching. Mrs. Samuel Blaisdell was efficient as nurse and doctress to her sex before the regular physician was settled or could be easily called. The family were largely natural and apt mechanics. Samuel, of another branch of the family, was the framing carpenter of those and later days. The family is now numerously represented. Eliphlet and Jacob were also early settlers. Eliphlet (2), deacon a long time of the Baptist Church at Lake village, and some of that branch, were, by affiliation, Baptists and efficient members. Other branches of the family were Free-Will Baptists and prominent, and still others were of other and more liberal belief and practice.

Dr. Zadock Bowman was practicing physician at the beginning of the century, and located at Meredith Bridge. David Bowman was the successor in the estate, which was and has been one of prominence. Mrs. Daniel Tilton now represents the family. John Boyd is sole representative of that name in the tax-list of 1896, and was possessed of an estate near Benjamin Jewett's. Enoch Boyd represented the name in later years, and occupied the homestead. Abel and Ephraim Brown, with Ephraim, Jr., are the representatives of that name, the former living at the lakeside, at what was afterwards the Almshouse farm, and the others in Miles Valley. They were men of means, except Ephraim, Jr.; and Nehemiah and Daniel were the children in possession success-sively. Captain Daniel and Nehemiah were of honorable standing in town affairs.

The name Buzzell (or Buswell) is early mentioned, and the names of Isaac, Ebenezer, Ichabod, Ichabod, Jr., Stephen, George and James are enrolled. The family settled in the east part of the town, on both sides of the mountain. The family of manufacturing men at Laconia bearing that name came later to town, and first operated the fulling and carding-mill on Gunstock River, and also did business in the woolen line at Lake village, and since have prosecuted an extensive and successful enterprise at Laconia, first in the old Parker warp-mill and later in Morrison's carding and fulling-mill and the Belknap Mill and later enlargements. They have shown business tact and skill. The names of Boynton, Burbank, Bradbury, Badger, Burleigh, Blake, Beede, Burns and Bickford are found in the list; but some are non-resident, and of others but little is known.

Tradition locates Bickford at Richard Dame's or Joseph P. Smith's. Captain Charles Beede came later and did blacksmithing at Gilford village and later at Laconia, and enlisted in the Union army at an advanced age.

The name of Robert Carr is associated with the Quaker faith, and he is known as Elder Carr. He early settled on an excellent glade of land at the mouth of the Miles Brook, and was one of the frugal and forehanded farmers, living in a stately and neatly-kept house—a semi-inn—of honorable repute. The teaming of products to Portsmouth and freighting back of groceries was a considerable branch of business in those days, and way-places for halting and accommodation were in demand. The sons of Robert Carr (John and Richard) located one at the homestead and the others at Alton. The family still remains in town.

The Clough family, represented by David, Aaron, Moses and Caleb, were here early, one at the east base of the mountains and the other at the Hoyt's neighborhood; and these families have gone. John C. Clough lived at Laconia and kept store on the Meredith side. The family remains in the place, but the business is closed.

The Clark name is more common, and applies to more than one lineage. Samuel Clark settled a little north of Folsom's Mills, and the family is of honorable mention, and from it came the Hon. Joseph Clark, of Manchester, Esq. Samuel Clark, of Lake village and others. William Clark settled farther north, on the Plains. Jacob and Mayhew were of Meredith Bridge, the former a shoemaker and musician. Others of the same name dwelt at Jewett's Corner and Laconia.

Ezekiel Collins settled here about 1807, in the neighborhood of Chattleborough Pond, and the family, in later generations, preserved its compact condition in its own neighborhood and in large numbers. Seven sons settled near, and daughters settled here and elsewhere. The mill in their plant has long been operated by some one of the name for sawing and threshing. They were an industrious and quiet people and mainly successful.

John Cotton settled near the hill bearing this name, in the south part of the town and a little off the Province road, and the family still has its representatives there. Simon Cotton was of the same line.

The Chase family is represented as early as 1806, and by the individual names of Mark, Green, James, Jr., and Widow Nancy. Their location is uncertain. Later, Albert and Hazeltine Chase came from London and were connected with the business and firm of Jewett, Chase & Thing, store-keepers at Gilford village; Albert, also, as clerk in the store of Charles Stark there, or Stark & Goodhue. Samuel Connor is among the inhabitants as early as 1810, and Joseph Connor lived near Captain Gilman's and Lieutenant Rand's. The house has gone and the family name is not preserved at present. They were connected with the McCoy's. The name of Cram is associated with inhabitants at Meredith Bridge. Jonathan and Widow Cram are the only names that appear in the lists.

Taxes were assessed on property of Dr. Call and James Crocket, residing in Meredith. A little later the Chesley family settled in the east part of the town, near Alton; but the family is no longer known among the people of that section. The Coles came later from Conway to Lake village and engaged in the furnace and foundry business. There were several of the second generation, and they at one time comprised a large portion of the active business men of Lake village. Benjamin Cole, Esq., has been prominent in public affairs for many years. The iron and hardware trade and works were largely in their hands, and it was successfully conducted and associated with general trade. The Crosbys have been of honorable mention. Josiah and Dixi have practiced medicine here with skill and ability. The former was also connected with the Avery Factory awhile. They were first from Sandwich and later lived at Gilman-ton Corner. The father, Asa Crosby, had an extensive practice in all the region. Sanborn Crosby was long an inhabitant near Meredith Bridge,—another family. Richard Dame settled near the Intervale and was a laborious and successful farmer; wore his uncut hair in a queue after the manner of the Quakers, and raised a large family, which have almost lost the name and representation in the place; yet, by marriage, the line is preserved under other names. Benjamin Dame pursued the blacksmith business and lived in different places in town. The family is largely gone, but few remain. The Davis family was prominent in early years. Malachi Davis settled, in 1790, near the Lily Pond and held a good estate. He was a father in matters of religion and politics. His house was for many years the place of holding the Democratic caucus, as well as the social religious meetings. His life was prolonged by means of a difficult surgical operation. His family was not large in the line of sons, but several daughters of good ability became well connected in married life, and still some are alive in advanced age. Several families of the name, and related, settled in his immediate neighborhood and also on the east side of the mountains. A family of the name resided at Meredith Bridge, and one at Lake village, known as Neighbor John. Nathaniel, called also Island Davis, occupied Governor's Island. He was a stalwart and commanding personage, and exercised his gifts as a leader in matters of free church order in preaching and public discussion. He raised a family of four sons and about the same number of daughters, who became well connected. The sons and himself were leaders in political and other public affairs. One, John, was a prominent teacher and afterwards agent of the factory company at Lake village. They have gone from the island, but are represented elsewhere. The family largely embraced Miller's doctrine, though at first following one Osgood, of anti-church government sentiments. William Miller, in person, held a camp-meeting on the island in 1840.

Abraham Dearborn lived awhile near the head of the gully and elsewhere. Jeremiah Dow, Josiah Dow, Samuel Dicey, William Drew and Joseph Drew are among the voters of 1813. They were connected with Meredith Bridge, except Drew, who was in the central part of the town. These are now largely gone from the place as families. The name of Eager was formerly known, but is now not current. Lieutenant Winthrop Eager is mentioned in 1813. Asa Eager and John Eager were citizens at Meredith Bridge (Asa Eager was sheriff and otherwise a public man; he kept hotel in early years) and known as connected with the county affairs and the court. Eager's tavern was situated nearly opposite the court-house. The name is not at present met here.

The Eaton family settled in the eastern part of the town. The same name is associated with the settlement at the Weirs, as occupying on the Meredith side. We have, in 1806 and 1813, Joseph, Joshua, Benjamin and Elias. Later, Eliska, Jonathan and Sherburn are on the records. Daniel, Esq., was recently a successful teacher. John and Martin have been in trade here and in Salem, Mass.

The Elkins family was formerly quite large. Daniel, Richard, Jonathan, James, John and Ezekiel are among those early here, and for the most part lived near the Suncook Mountains (west of them), and one family on the Lake road.

John Evans, Esq., was a leading man, living on the east part of the Lake-Shore road. Samuel and George were members of the family, and the former a teacher. The name is not now found in the town.

The Egerly name at Meredith Bridge, as Nathaniel, the register of deeds, is of later date.

The Edwards family was here early, and Nathaniel, in the second generation, was a long while a proprietor and conductor of the shoe-business at Meredith Bridge.

The Foster family first located in the centre of the Intervale, occupied the D. Y. Smith place, and also, later, on Miles River, near the Morrill neighborhood. Thomas was first here before 1806, and Thomas, Jr., John and Daniel continued the family to recent years; but now the name is but little known.

Samuel Foss was early living near Mount Minor.

Ezekiel Flanders occupied land on the east side of Mount Prospect, and belongs to the large family of that name in Alton. The line is still continued here.

James Follet came to Gilford about 1792, and wrought at blacksmith work. He was brother-in-law to Rev. Richard Martin, and settled near him on Meeting-House Hill. He was efficient in public affairs, being repeatedly the collector of taxes, constable and captain in the militia. He carried on the tanning business, and engaged to some extent in trade, which his sons also took up and conducted at different places. He raised a large family of sons and daughters; the sons are all enterprising, efficient men, and the daughters have all married well. They have been scattered and reduced in numbers in later years, and the original house, so intimately associated with the early town-meetings and the Sabbath meetings, and the first store, Pearley's, has been burnt. Samuel Follet is once found on the tax-list, and that in 1810.

The Folsom name appears very early and in frequency. Jonathan Folsom signed the Test Paper (political), in 1776, as an inhabitant of Gilmanton; probably located not within the limits of the present Gilford, as it is conceded that there were no families then settled on its territory. He is, however, a taxpayer in 1813. Abraham Folsom is said to have settled in town in 1781, and to have built his mill at that date, for the town gave the five acres for a mill privilege and built the bridge at his mills, or the Weirs (Lower Weirs), the year before,—i. e. 1780,—and the bridge was located above the mills in 1782. He subsequently built his house on the Meredith side and was a citizen of that town, and the estate and property was included therein till that section was set off to Gilford recently. Two lots in the eighth range were sold to build the bridge, and the five acres given to him. The other families of this name were those of Nathaniel, Benjamin, John, Dudley and others, who have held high places in public affairs and several have been distinguished.

The Gilmans are both conspicuous and numerous. They came early and later. Foremost is Captain John F., who settled near the Lily Pond in the same year that Abraham Folsom came, in 1781. He was a principal citizen and land-holder, and by his captaincy was always a marked character. His family was by adoption, including James McCoy and Gilman Thing. Ezekiel Gilman came the same year and settled near Benjamin Jewett's place. Lieutenant John Gilman settled on the south of Captain John F.; and Dudley still further to the southwest, coming in 1789; and Andrew possessed a large estate at the foot of the mountains, west side, and near by Samuel and Joshua. Levi and Samuel settled near Gunstock or Meeting-House Hill. Robinson Gilman located at Meredith Bridge, and Antipas on Liberty Hill. These all have held lineal connections with the great Gilman fraternity, and they are also, by one branch or other, connected by intermarriages with most of the families of the town at large. Most of them had large families.

Abel (elder) and Manoah Glidden settled near Alton line and the mountains. The latter came in 1796. They were leading men in that section, and their descendants are still in possession of the estates. Abel (2d) is also a minister. The father was a man of native talent.

Levi, John and Jethro Goss settled on the north part of Gunstock Hill, and from that place the large families of sons and daughters settled in different parts of the town and elsewhere. The homesteads have passed out of the name, but not all of them from the lineal heirs.

Elijah Gove settled on the west side of Gunstock Hill, and his son Daniel was a successor to the estate, and a mechanic and constructor of various farming implements. The estate is in the same name.

David Gould settled land to the southeast of Gilford village and had one son and one daughter. They all lived to a good old age and the family became extinct. They were engaged in cooperage and were in comfortable circumstances.

Jonathan Grant was early an inhabitant, and several families of the name, as Paul's, Daniel's and Levi's, have been citizens. They have been located in the south and in the north extremes of the eastern part of the town, and their families are but little represented now.

The names Godfrey, Greene, Gilbert and Gilford were known at Meredith Bridge.

Jacob Hackett and John Hackett settled in Chattleborough and their families have become extinct, or nearly so, and the remnant has removed.

David Hale settled on the Oaks road and was a prominent citizen and of good property, but died about the time the town was incorporated. The name has disappeared. The Hibbard and Plummer families succeeded to the estate, and they, in turn, have become extinct in that neighborhood.

Nathan Hatch settled in the lower Gunstock Valley and carried on the cooper's business, and had a family, who are still in Gilford, though not occupying the homestead or pursuing the trade.

The Hoyt family was one of prominence and large numbers and rank. Simeon, Daniel and Enoch Hoyt settled in Chattleborough and held large estates and excellent lands. They had large families, who settled in different parts of the town and many emigrated to other places. Simeon Hoyt built, with Ebenezer Smith, Esq., the Gunstock Mills in 1789, six years after his settling in Gilford. Ebenezer Hoyt went to Hampstead, and Samuel, James and James, Jr., were citizens in 1806.

James Hoyt (3d) is also in the list of 1813 and 1808. One of this name lived near Lieutenant J. Gilman's, and one settled near the Upper Weirs and had two sons, who were well educated and held positions of importance in educational affairs, and a daughter, who was married to Captain Winborn Sanborn, so long in command of steamers on the lake and lately deceased. Colonel Peaslee Hoyt settled at the base of Mount Major; Nathaniel on Liberty Hill; Simeon, Jr., Enoch, Jr., and Thomas near Chattleborough Pond. These families were in good social standing and were active citizens.

The name of Hunt is also of prominence. Abel Hunt came in 1783 and settled near the Intervale. He raised a large family and carried on the carpenter's and cabinet-maker's business. He had the only turning-lathe in the place, and made chairs and other furniture. He was employed to do the inside work and construct the pews in the first church.

Enoch Hunt settled, in 1794, near Captain I. F. Gilman's and was a prominent citizen, and his sons—William, Samuel, Joseph, Ebenezer S., John S. and Enoch—were persons of standing and figured largely in public affairs. Benjamin Hunt also settled in this vicinity; his successors carried on mechanical enterprises and have settled elsewhere.

The names of Horn, Hadley, Hill and Hutchinson also are found among the early inhabitants; the two last named lived at the foot of Gunstock Mountain, and the name has ceased to exist there.

Aaron Jackson settled near Jacob Jewett's and was related to Richard Martyn by marriage. His son Stanford built near him and committed suicide in his building. The name has disappeared.

Major Jabez James came into town in 1784 and settled near Cotton's Hill, on the north incline, on some excellent land. He was one of the largest taxpayers in the first years. His estate still remains in the name and the family holds its rank. He was a Revolutionary soldier and had sons, John and Jonathan, who settled near. Jonathan and John James settled near each other in the same neighborhood and their families are still represented in the place, though some have removed to other places. The families were not large, but of good standing and worthy in example.

The Jewett families, already alluded to, are of honorable mention and have been important as connected with the business affairs and pursuits of the people. Samuel Jewett is said to have settled in 1777 (though another statement makes him to have been first mentioned in the records in 1789) and lived a half-mile from the Bridge, or Falls, and above them. He sold land for a mill privilege in 1780.

Benjamin and Jacob settled, successively, to the north of him, and their estates extended in a line two miles to the northeast. Their families have continued distinct and prominent till the present time. In 1806, Benjamin, Jr., is found in the list. He succeeded, about 1816, Jonas Sleeper in trade and other business at Gilford village and did the chief business there for many years. As postmaster, justice, town treasurer and in other positions of trust and responsibility he proved a valuable citizen and efficient official. His brothers were John and Moses. Other families of the name were John, Smith, Woodman, Samuel, Jr., and Rev. Daniel, all active men.

Joseph Jones was a citizen in 1813, but does not appear in earlier lists.

Abel, Samuel and Daniel Kimbal and George Keniston were assessed, but the time and place of their settlement is not certain. Later, Mr. Kimbal lived north of Samuel F. Gilman.

Elder John Knowles settled on the south part of Liberty Hill and became the minister of a church organized in that part of the town. He also preached at Gilford village and other places. He was a farmer at the same time and a man of high standing. His sons, John D. and Elbridge, became ministers also. The former preached at various places and embraced Second Adventism. The latter was settled at the Province Road Church, a Free-Will Baptist. William, another son, lived at different places, and was a while the miller at the Hoyt (then Morrill's) Mill. Another son became a Shaker at Canterbury. The family and name is but limitedly known at the present time.

Colonel Samuel Ladd came to Meredith Bridge and bought of Stephen Gale his mill and mill privilege. This mill was built about 1775 on the Meredith side and was carried away by a freshet in 1779. In 1780, Colonel Ladd rebuilt the mill on the Gilford side, and also built a dwelling-house, which was the first one at that place, and has ever since been known as the Mill-House. The dam built here proved insufficient to withstand the pressure of so great a volume of water. It was carried away three times (in three successive years) after Colonel Ladd built it and once before. The mill was burnt in 1788 and rebuilt and enlarged, with machinery for sawing added to that for grinding. With heroic courage, he established the milling business at this place. Dudley Ladd continued the enterprise, and Jonathan appears taxed in 1813.

John Lamprey settled near the Alton line and built a saw-mill on a small stream near his house. His was the only family of that name in Gilford at that time, but at a later date a family of the name located at Meredith Bridge. He was a man of great strength and endurance. His sons were John, Richard, Samuel and Reuben, who settled in different places. The family is but limitedly represented at the present time here.

Winthrop, Moses and Vowell Langley appear in the lists, and their location was in the northwest part of the town, and the name is not now common.

The Leavitt family is reckoned as among the early comers into town. Stephen is said to have come in 1785, and Jonathan in 1793. The particular families that have located in town, besides Jonathan's and Stephen's, were those of Reuben, Jonathan, Jr., Lieutenant Samuel and Miles, all on the Lake-Shore road; and Benjamin, Stephen, Jr., and Jacob, all on the Intervale; Miles Jr., in the Miles River Valley; Nehemiah, Samuel, Jr., and Jonathan (the Little) and Levi, elsewhere in town. The family grant was a large one, and the descendants are widely dispersed and variously connected. Frederick Lewis is in the list, but his location is uncertain. Joseph and Benjamin Libby settled on the Oaks road, and later, Elias occupied the place. The family was of good repute, and is still there. Levi Lovit was one of the earliest settlers, first locating near Black Brook, then near Governor's Island, after a short residence in Meredith; his trade was that of basket-making, and the sons followed the same business. Ephraim Mallard settled early at Meredith Bridge, and carried on the cabinet and furniture business; and he was for many years moderator at town-meetings, and was a man of distinction, and trustworthy. Was representative, and held several other offices in the gift of the people. The only other family of the name was that of Henry, a brother, who lived at the centre and eastern part of the town, in different houses. James McCoy was brought to town by Captain S. F. Gilman, by whom he was brought up, and near whom he lived. He had the care of the burying-ground in that part of the town, and was thought to have magic power, or art, to cure the toothache. His family and name have not been known in town for some years.

Elder Richard Martin came to Gilford in the year 1796. Four years previous, in 1792, two meeting-houses were begun in what was then called, as a whole, the Upper Parish, viz.: the Province Road and the Gunstock meeting-houses. The one was intended as a Second Parish Congregational Church; and, as the Baptist interests and cause was pushed in the Lower Parish, to a separation the Upper Parish Church (being built by common taxation, or town aid) was to be for the free use of Baptists also, and even of any other dissenting parties or bodies. The Baptists were conceded the use of the church a portion of the time, and to the occupancy of the church for that part of the time Elder Martin was invited by the Baptist party, as he had been ordained the year previous, at Lee, as a Baptist preacher. He settled on the lot next to the church. It is not stated that this lot was the one regularly reserved as a parsonage lot. It partly abutted on the lot set apart, in 1780, for the ministerial support, viz.: No. 10, in the thirteenth range, and the one on which the village is mostly situated,

A forty-acre lot, on the south end of the second division of such lots, was, in 1771, assigned, apparently, for each of the two Upper Parish ministerial supports, and another one hundred acre lot in Tioga, No. 13 of the seventh range, so that the two North Parish enterprises seemed to have their provisions made for support. Perhaps the Baptists did not claim exclusive right to this; hence Mr. Martin did not settle on it. He built his house conveniently near to the church, as it were, forty rods.

When measures were taken to install him by the Baptists he dissented from the Calvinistic feature of their articles of faith, being an Immersionist, but not a Calvinist. He therefore became a preacher of that party, which also rejected the Calvinistic sentiments, and which was organized into an Anti-Calvinistic Baptist Church, agreeing substantially with the preachings of Benjamin Randal and John Buzzell, and which had already been termed the Free-Will Baptists.

He exercised his ministry with and for this class of people, in this and adjoining places, for a little more than twenty-five years, until his death, in 1824. He was a man endeared and faithful. He cultivated his farm, and, with his sons, carried on some business in the line of tanning, as did his brother-in-law, James Follet, who was settled by his side. His family included two sons—Richard, Jr., and John L.—and a daughter, who married George Saunders. These were persons of marked power. Richard was efficient as a ready lay preacher, and John L. as a propagator of doctrines differing from those held by the father, and more coincident with the Universalist faith. He was prominent in public civil affairs while he remained a citizen of Gilford, from which he emigrated after the death of his father, and was of honorable standing elsewhere. Richard, Jr., lived at Lake village, or near there, for many years, and left a daughter.

Aaron Martin, of another lineage, was a manufacturer of paper at Meredith Bridge, in the days of its beginning. His paper-mill, located on the Gilford side, was burnt, and ceased operations many years ago, and the manufactory has not been rebuilt or the work resumed by other adventurers.

The Martin name has not been on the lists in later years.

Lieutenant Samuel B. Mason and Ephraim Mason are in the lists. Mason located near the lake, east from Governor's Island. The family, once of some standing, has not remained to the present.

Caleb Marsten came to town in 1763, and settled east of the Intervale, on the Mountain road. He was a man of leading ability, a leader in meetings, and improved his gifts as lay preacher, and was deacon of the first church. He had but one son, Captain Caleb O., who was a prominent citizen, and several daughters, who became well connected; and, though the name has disappeared, the lineal descendants are many, and preserve the qualities of the parent stock. Some of the best elements of society are traceable to this source.

James Merrill settled on the Intervale, and from this family was Major J. Q. Merrill descended. The family had but few members.

Another brother settled south of Folsom's Mills, and was a farmer.

John Meloon was an early settler and miller at the Morrill grist-mill.

A son, Waldo, emigrated to Bear Island, and the name is no longer known here.

John Mooney came from New Durham, and settled near Alton, on the Mountain road. He was a man of standing and property. He had a large family; his sons were Benjamin, Burnham, Joseph, Stephen (who was a preacher among Adventists) and Charles. The estate is still held in the name, and many of the descendants live in the vicinity.

The Morrill families are prominent among the inhabitants. These are not from the same stock, and are located in different parts.

Barnard Morrill came early from Brentwood; worked with Jeremiah Thing and learned the tanning business. Mr. Thing's residence and business was on Liberty Hill. Afterwards Mr. Morrill located at Hoyt & Smith's mill, on the ministry lot, and carried on the tanning and shoe business. Subsequently he purchased the mill and the grist-mill and the ministry lot, and carried on the large part of the business of the place. He was esquire and captain and a leading man in his times. He had but one son, General J. J. Morrill, who continued his business, enlarged it and, in company with other men at different times (in the tanning department only), prosecuted it for many years by steam-power. The lumbering interests have all the time engaged their special attention. The property held by them has been large, and located in different parts of the town and elsewhere. Farming, and on an improved plan, has been successfully and continuously conducted, and profitably.

Jonathan Morrill settled in the upper part of the Miles River Valley, at the natural pond included in the Foster's Pond flowage. The descendants, a large family of sons, settled in the immediate vicinity, called the Morrill Neighborhood. They have gained wealth by industry and economy, and still hold their numbers and standing.

James Morrill settled near the mountains; Zebedee, near the Jewetts; Samuel and John D., at the foot of Mount Major, and afterwards elsewhere.

Amos Morrill carried on the wool-carding business at Hoyt's Mills at one time, which business was transferred to the fulling-mill below, on the same stream, and carried on by other parties.

Benjamin and Henry and Uriah Morrison were citizens at early times, the latter being minister of the Baptist Church when it worshipped in the Gun-stock meeting-house, or in the school-house and other places in the vicinity, as that was their custom for many years before the church was built at Lake village. He came from Somersworth to supply the Baptists in the Upper Parish, then organized into the Second Church, and placed under his care in 1811. He lived near the Locklin, in the house afterwards occupied by Dr Josiah Sawyer. He died in 1817, after a pastorate of about six years, and his wife died soon after this, in 1819, and the family did not remain in town afterwards.

The other Morrison families were not long continued in town, save that of James and Abram. Benjamin is said to be of Deerfield.

The Morrison family located on Liberty Hill, of whom Mrs. Barnard Morrill, Esq., was descended (viz., Jonathan Morrison, who was a Revolutionary soldier), emigrated elsewhere, and was succeeded by John Stevens. (He lived awhile, after leaving Gilford, in Tuftonborough, N. H.)

James Morrison succeeded to his father's estate at Meredith Bridge, and was a teacher at times, and afterwards carried on the wool-carding business at Meredith Bridge, in the old Parker warp-mill, and added fulling and dressing of cloth to his business, and was succeeded in the business by the Buzzells,—father and sons. He left no family, and was a man of good ability and decided character.

Abram Morrison, his brother, has long been a business man at the same place. He kept the Eager Hotel from 1846 to 1857, the Willard from 1857 to 1868, and since then a livery-stable, and succeeds to the homestead and brother's residence.

Captain John Moody was assessed but not definitely located. The Moody family and name was known to the Lower Parish, and not, save as land-holder, here.

Jacob Morse settled on the border of Alton, near two sons,—Abner and David,—whose families still remain. They were industrious farmers.

Dr. George W. Munsey, in boyhood, lived with Samuel Blaisdell. In youth he studied at Dunmer's Academy, in Newbury, Mass., and was a teacher; when a young man, married Hannah Barton, of Epsom, and afterwards practiced medicine in Moultonborough, Centre Harbor and Gilford, living in several places in this town, as at David Hale's, on the Oaks road, near the Alton line, on the Pond road, and at two places in the Centre village. He was a practitioner of no ordinary ability and skill; but, having a large family to support and an unremunerative practice, peculiar to those days, was often in straitened circumstances. He had good powers of oratory, and after the Washingtonian movement, led by John Hawkins, he lectured on temperance as a reformed man. He lived past his four-score, and his wife to her one hundredth year. Of his sons, Barton is a physician of the eclectic practice and the homeopathic principle. His skill as a practitioner and handiness as an artisan are beyond doubt. He early worked at the jeweler's business, and in that showed rare inventive ability. His travel has been extensive, both in this and in other countries, and his attainments are commensurate.

The other sons were George W., Benjamin, William, Amos Prescott and David Hall. Of these, George W., first, and afterward Amos Prescott and David Hall worked at the trade of shoe-making; and William and Benjamin, who emigrated to Cape Ann, were in trade and business there. Of the six daughters, four remain living, and are active in their spheres. One of these is the wife of Rev. Josiah Gilman, of Lynn, Mass.

Josiah and Robert Moulton are early tax-payers, but tradition fixes not their habitat; and John C., of Meredith Bridge, was of prominence as postmaster, trader and later as a manufacturer. He began business at Lake village, where he was burnt out. His social and political and official standing has been high.

Captain Jonathan Nelson was tax-payer, but his habitat uncertain.

Captain John S. Osgood settled near Samuel Jewett's, and Samuel located on Liberty Hill; Prescott at Meredith Bridge. The name and family was of some standing. In later years Enoch Osgood (wheelwright) lived at Gilford village, and Dr. Osgood (dentist) practiced his profession at Laconia.

Of Micajah Osborne, only his assessment is mentioned.

John and Joseph Ollin have been citizens and tradesmen in recent times.

A Page family, that of a soldier in the War of the Revolution, was settled near Daniel Hoyt's. The house and family soon disappeared, but Henry Page, of Sandown, was a tax-payer for many years, and then ceases that name altogether.

Captain Rufus Parish is tax-payer for Cynthia Parish.

William Peasley also is a tax-payer, though probably non-resident.

Stephen Pearly was settled at Meredith Bridge, where he was in trade, and stocked a store at James Follet's, and by clerks carried on a business some years. He was a tax-payer in the early years of the town; a man of distinction and enterprise at the village where he lived. The family included Dr. John L. Pearly, of some note as a practitioner and as a citizen of Meredith and Laconia.

The Piper family was settled first in the south-eastern part of the town, and the names of Nathaniel and Thomas are the only ones in the early tax-lists. Alfred lost an arm and lived many years at Meredith Bridge.

Henry Plummer came early to Gilmanton. Henry, Jr., settled at the base of Mount Minor, or the Piper Mountain; he was a mason by trade. William or Billy Plummer is in the list, and Jesse Plummer also lived near the mountain. The heirs of Hannah Plummer are also in the list of the assessed. Thomas and Moses are found dwelling on the Oaks road on the homestead, and Thomas later at the Plains and in Lake village. He was a wheelwright and worked at that trade many years, and died at an advanced age and left no family. Moses left two sons, Thomas and James, who were active business men, but lived at different places. James was hotel landlord and tradesman.

Joseph and Israel Potter settled early in the vicinity of Gilford village. They were brothers, held good lots and their families remain to this day. They came directly from the Lower Parish, where Samuel Potter settled in 1783. Their families were not large and they both worked at shoe-making. In the second generation these families were large, through Joseph, Jr., of one, and Thomas of the other. The late Adjutant John M. and Thomas D., of Boston, being of considerable note as traders and manufacturers, represent these families respectively.

Jonathan Prescott came to Gilmanton in 1793, and died in 1809. Jonathan, of the third generation, son of Timothy, was tax-payer in 1813. Horatio G. was also a citizen at the same time, and did business at Meredith Bridge, and was the first postmaster there, in 1824. The office was named simply Gilford, though sometimes kept on the Meredith side.

Richard Palmer is assessed in 1808, but his habitat is uncertain.

Jacob Quimby was a resident at one time near the Intervale.

Lieutenant Philbrook Rand settled near Abel Hunt's in 1790, and north of Gunstock Hill, and improved some excellent land. The family still occupy the old homestead, and Simon, his son, has been a prominent citizen. Joseph Rand lived awhile at the village, and removed from the town in its first years. The Rand family was not large. George Rand was once a resident, but emigrated early, and Samuel also.

Benjamin Richardson appears to be an inhabitant in 1813. Habitat uncertain.

Joseph Robberts, from New Durham, settled in the Mooney neighborhood, and was, by trade, a tailor. He carried on also farming, and had a large family, of whom Charles and Joseph are successful business men in Boston,—dealers in iron and machinery. They wrought at blacksmithing before leaving Gilford. The family has gone from the homestead, and settled in various places.

The Rollins name, so common in Alton, had one representative in Gilford in John Rollins, who is taxed for property near the Alton line. Elder John Rollins, from Moultonborough, preached a while, succeeding Richard Martin.

The Rowe family is quite extensive, and was early settled in the place. Ezekiel and Jacob came in 1796. Jeremiah appears soon after, and Richard and Samuel; also Jeremiah (2d and 3d), and Joseph. They settled in the south part of the town, near Liberty and Cotton's Hills. Kelley Rowe was afterwards a Baptist preacher, though never ordained. Benjamin Rowe came from Brentwood in 1816, and worked at the wool-carding business, at the Upper Mill, near Hoyt's saw-mill, and also at the Lower Mill, whither the machinery was removed. He also carried on farming, brick-making and the making of farming implements, as wheels, plows, rakes, etc. He lived to be nearly one hundred years old; was a teacher of vocal music and a drummer in early life. His oldest son, Hon. John M., was long engaged in the quarry business, at Frankfort, Me., and resides still there. Another son, Benjamin F., was professor of elocution, teaching that department at Bowdoin College and elsewhere, and died young. The members of this family were all excellent singers and musicians.

Moses Rowell settled on the Oaks road, between the Weirs and Upper Weirs, and had two sons, Jacob and Philip. These three families are nearly extinct; the name is not left.

Jacob Rundlet (sometimes spelled Ranlet) settled near Governor's Island, and was a man of influence, and held the office of deacon. The family name is lost, though a lineal descendant represents the family. Theophilus Ranlet is the only other one of the name on the tax-list.

Isaac Runnells settled on the Intervale at the Thomas Foster place. The name and family have not had a representative in later years.

Thomas Saltmarsh, selectman the first year of the town's corporate state, had settled at the Pond, called sometimes the Saltmarsh Pond, and sometimes Chatteborough Pond, after the name of one Thomas Chatte, who had lived awhile and squatted on the opposite (south) shore of it; and he (Saltmarsh) had a good farm and good social standing. The family continued, represented by three sons, Thomas, William and Seth, but has now disappeared.

The Sandborn, or Sanborn family, is extensive and of several distinct divisions. The numerous inhabitants of Sanborn are allied. Deacon Jonathan settled at the foot of Liberty Hill, and had a good estate. He was a man of piety and influence, and his sons were Jonathan, Jacob and Joseph. The latter was a trader at Gilford village, and carried on extensively the cooperage business, making barrels for the Portsmouth market. Israel settled south of Liberty Hill, and his son was Deacon Levi, of Meredith Bridge, and daughter Mary, the school-mistress of those early years. Benjamin Sanborn, of another lineage, settled in the Jewett neighborhood; and his sons were Benjamin Jr., Esq., and Abial. Lowell Sanborn, of still another lineage, whose sons were Lowell, Richard and Elisha, settled near the lake, off Governor's Island; and Samuel Gilman Sanborn, father of Captain Winborn and John G. (also a son of Lowell, Sr.), was located in the same neighborhood, and was a man of uncommon ability and honorable influence.

Richard settled near Captain S. F. and Lieutenant John Gilman. He was a carpenter, as was Lowell and his sons, and also his own three sons,—Lowell, Jr., Richard, Jr., and Osgood. By these six or seven men much of the building of those days was done. Samuel and David are reckoned in the same connection. Benjamin, of Laconia, the carpenter, was of the family of Lowell; and Benjamin, the shoe-dealer, first at Lake village and later of Laconia, was of another family. Meshech Sanborn came later to Gilford village from Brentwood, to conduct the wool-carding and fulling business. He bought and ran the Chapman (or Mingo) Mill; was afterwards post-master and store-keeper, alone and in company; was town clerk and in various places of responsibility. He had no sons, but five daughters, who are well connected, one of them being the wife of General J. J. Morrill, and another married Dr. A. G. Weeks. Lowell Sanborn, popularly termed Deacon Lowell, a millwright and mechanic at large, was from Gilmanton, and returned thither and was miller at Morrill's grist-mill awhile. Joseph Sanborn, the tailor, lived and worked at his trade near Gunstock Hill. John Sargent settled very near and to the southwest of Captain Gilman's. He had no son; so his estate was inherited by his son-in-law, John S. Hunt. William Sargent, drover and later a hotel-keeper at Lake village, first settled on that part of Meredith, and later of Laconia, which has been lately annexed to Gilford. He was a man of business, and had suffered the loss of an arm and an eye. George Sanders settled near the lake, by the Sanborns, and was a leading citizen. He married the daughter of Richard Martin, had a superior farm, and a son of his, George W., still lives in town, though not on the homestead, but near by, on the Intervale, at Captain L. P. Smith's place. S. W. Sanders, dealer in hardware at Laconia, is of another family.

Josiah Sawyer early settled on the height of land west of the Miles River Valley, and cultivated a large plant there and adjacent. His sons were Israel, Dr. Josiah, John and Joseph, and of these, Israel had the homestead, John settled in West Alton, Joseph in Gilmanton, and Dr. Josiah practiced medicine in Gilford. He was a practitioner of some medical skill, though not read in the regular course. Religiously, he held deistical sentiments. The Sawyer name is still kept, though there were but few males in the line. Seth Sawyer afterwards preached a while in the Gilford village church.

Thomas, William, Mathias and John Sewall are the individuals bearing this surname. Thomas first lived in the south part of the town, near Liberty Hill; subsequently he moved to the plains near Black Brook and married the widow of Samuel Bartlett; he was a drover at one time. Mathias lived near him there and also at other places, and worked at the tanning business, as did also Thomas. He lived at Gilford village at different times and worked at Thing's and Morrill's tanneries. William and John are supposed to have remained at the south part of the town. The family name has disappeared, though a lineal descendant remains.

Levi Shaw settled first near Israel Potter's, on the Sanborn place, then at or near Saltmarsh Pond, and afterwards to the south of the pond. He was a man of great physical strength and endurance. The family name has become extinct, but the line is kept by other names. William Sibley early settled near Gunstock Mountain. His father was the first merchant in Gilmanton. His half-brother, George Littlefield Sibley, located at Meredith Bridge; was in trade many years and agent of the railroad company, and afterwards retired and died at great age. William Sibley had no male children, and Mrs. John Elkins succeeded to the paternal estate. The family name is now extinct.

The name of Sleeper is represented by Esquire Nehemiah, Henry, Joseph and Jonas. Nehemiah, Esq., settled on the lake-shore, near Esquire Evans', and was possessed of a good estate, to which George, now of Laconia, succeeded. Joseph and Henry were settled near Wm. Sibley's, at the west base of Gunstock Mountain, and Henry did business at Gilford village and emigrated thence. Joseph was the accredited surveyor of his times, and had defined for conveyance most of the lands of the town. He subsequently moved to the farm in the Jewett neighborhood. Henry, Jr., lives at Lake village, and has held important offices in the town government. Jonas Sleeper was trader at Gilford village and died of spotted fever in the epidemic of the winter of 1814-1815. His sons were Dr. Francis, of Laconia; Jonas, lawyer, of Haverhill, N. H.; and Sarah, lately Mrs. Smith, of Bangkok, Siam. It was an intellectual family. The mother was the daughter of Farmer Bean, of Gilmanton. The daughter was preceptress at New Hampton, and one of the first missionaries of the Baptist Society to India, and she has lived there for a period of some fifty years. Francis was maimed in childhood by the fracture of his skull from a fragment of a blast; and, though he sustained the loss of some portion of the brain, yet skillful surgery restored health, and there seemed no detriment of intellectual ability resultant. The mother married Benjamin Jewett, Jr., Esq., and died soon after.

The Smith family is of special importance in Gilford history. Judge Ebenezer Smith, of Meredith, was a man superior in the affairs of the State about the time of the Revolutionary War. His connection with the early surveys of this territory enabled him to know the location of the best lands. He chose considerable tracts on and near the Intervale, and between bogs in Meredith. His sons, Ebenezer, Esq. and John, Esq., improved the land thus selected here—Esquire Ebenezer at the head, and Esquire John at the foot of the Intervale. One Oliver Smith, also connected with the survey, had a place and a rude building on the east margin of the Intervale.

The sons of Esquire Ebenezer were John, Isaac, Daniel, Joseph P. and Ebenezer, Jr. John occupied the homestead after the sudden and accidental death of the father, and had no sons. Ebenezer, Jr., located a little distance north of the homestead, and had one son, Jeremiah. Joseph P. settled at different places, elsewhere and at the village, and finally on the flank of the Intervale, near Caleb Marston's estate—a place bought of Joseph Fifield, and improved by True Bean, and he had no sons. Daniel was of an inventive nature, and engaged in manufacturing at Meredith village, and afterwards, on a reverse in business, lived at his father-in-law's, Richard Dame's, and engaged in farming, and still later lived at Gilford village, where he died, and left no son. Isaac settled on the Lake-Shore road, beyond the limits of Gilford, and he had no son. The family held social distinction from first to last.

The other son of Judge Smith, John, Esq., lived awhile here, and latterly at the homestead in Meredith, and his son, Captain John, or Deacon John, called John P., occupied the spacious house in Gilford. The property of father and son, as well as that of the grandfather, was great, and was increased by inheritance from another son of Judge Smith, Daniel, of Meredith. The religious character of Esquire John and Deacon John P. was well marked and of a high order, and generous gifts to the needy were of no infrequent occurrence. Here was an asylum for the distressed. John P. had two sons and one daughter,—Daniel K., a proficient scholar, a surveyor of precision and repute, who died in middle age, after holding a major's commission and being married, but having no issue; John P., Jr., who still lives in Gilford; and the wife of Richard Gove, of Laconia, many years ago deceased, and without issue. A son of Washington Smith, of Meredith (the remaining son of Judge Smith), by the name of Joshua, lived in that part of Laconia lately annexed to Gilford. John Rice Smith, of Meredith, has been a tax-payer in Gilford on account of land occupied by sons-in-law, Stanford Jackson and Dudley Gilman and Moses Dockham. The Smith name was not, as elsewhere, proverbially common here.

The Stevens family was early in Gilford. Paul Stevens, who worked at shoe-making, first lived in the south part of the town, and then near Israel Potter's, in the house built by Samuel Potter. He had a large family, of which was Colonel Ebenezer Stevens, who worked at the blacksmith trade at Gilford village, and since living at Meredith village,—a man of high social standing and rare ability. Also William, who also worked at blacksmithing at Gilford village, and afterwards emigrated to the West, having one daughter, the wife of Benjamin Wadleigh, Esq. Also Paul, Jr., who was a mason by trade; and Smith, and John and Moses, and several daughters, who were residents, and conducted business in the line of millinery at several places.

John Stevens settled on Liberty Hill and had a large estate there, bought of Jonathan Morrill. He had sons, Sherburn, Hubbard and Siskum. The estate was later occupied by his daughters, but has since passed into other hands. The sons, except Sherburn, moved to other places, and the other members of the family also removed. Sherburn lived south of Liberty Hill and, at last, near Laconia. He had two sons, Frank and John, who were dentists, and the former was also physician.

Daniel Stevens was an early settler, and located at the south part of the town. Benjamin Stevens lived near Lieutenant John Gilman, and afterwards moved to the town of Hill. Ensign Stevens (so called), once lived on Gunstock Hill, where Jeremiah Gilman afterwards lived, and later lived at Lake village and elsewhere.

Nathaniel Stevens, a tailor, came to Meredith Bridge about 1840, and pursued his vocation there many years, and with good success.

Nathan Swain and Joseph Swain were citizens; the latter located near the Locklin, and had sons, Moses and Sylvester, who live elsewhere. He was a man of religious activity. His wife died from burns, when his house was consumed. The estate has gone out of the name, but to direct heirs.

Chase Swain lived at different places, and a son, Charles, was a blacksmith at Gilford village and other places.

Henry Swasey lived in the west part of the town, and his son Henry served his time at Henry Whittier's, and has since been in trade at Lake village.

Littlefield Taylor was in the tax-list of 1813, and his residence not indicated.

Badger Taylor was a machinist at Meredith Bridge for many years. He had one son, who became a minister, and a daughter who was well connected.

General Tay (so called), lived at Meredith Bridge, and was builder there.

The Thing family is an old one, and includes Jeremiah, Jesse, Joseph, Jeremiah, Jr., and Morrill, and some of later generations, though not numerous.

Jeremiah settled on Liberty Hill before the beginning of this century, and carried on the tanning business, and had Bernard Morrill as apprentice, and others. He came from Brentwood and had two sons, Jeremiah, Jr., and Morrill, who also were tanners. The former lived at the homestead till, in later years, he went into trade with Jewett & Chase, at the village, and, still later, at New Hampton.

He was in his younger years a school-teacher and a severe disciplinarian. Morrill Thing carried on the tanning business at Gilford village for several years, and afterwards at the homestead; and, after the death of his parents, moved to the Mathias Weeks place, and remained there till death. He was repeatedly in office as selectman and representative and in other positions. He was well versed in town affairs, and, in the Legislature, a man of ability and trust. His family were mostly short-lived, and but few of them remain. His wife was from the line of Esquire Benjamin Weeks, and an executive woman. Associated is Jesse Thing, of whom less is known now. Joseph Thing lived near the mountain, by William Sibley's. His son Joseph lived at Lake village, and a grandson is an artist in Ohio. He afterwards moved to Lake village, and was a man of ability. He was a carpenter by trade; built the Goodhue house, and kept a small store. He was elevated to positions of trust, and was a useful citizen. Gilman Thing succeeded to the Captain Gilman estate, and had no son.

The Thompson family was one of the early ones, and quite large. David Thompson settled near the Miles River in its middle course. His sons were Jonathan, Jr., and Levi B., the latter being the youngest of the family, and inheriting the homestead. After the death of the parents he removed to Topsham, Me., and was in trade in Brunswick, Me., for some years, where his son, Dr. A. J. Thompson, graduated. He afterwards was in trade at Gilford village with his older son, John, and still later, moved to Sanbornston. Dr. A. J. Thompson was in practice at Meredith Bridge; went into the army, and, after practicing in Salem, Mass., awhile, died there. He was a man of superior talents and of high social standing. Samuel Thompson settled on the Lake-Shore road, near the Intervale, and had three sons, who lived elsewhere in the State. Jonathan Thompson lived on the road near Governor's Island. Jacob Thompson lived at various places. Thomas and Charles are also named. Most of the members of these three Thompson families were of great stature, and one was called, to distinguish him from another of the same name, "Long John." The families have been much reduced in later years, and there is scarcely any of the lineage bearing the name left in town.

The Thurston family was early on the ground as settlers. Benjamin Thurston came soon after Samuel, who is recorded as settling in 1791. Samuel located in the south part of the town, and Benjamin near the Intervale. Miles L. and Benjamin L. succeeded him in the order of descent and on the homestead. They held a large landed estate, and were in good circumstances and robust. The widow of Benjamin (1st) lived to be in her one hundredth year, and left one son and several daughters. Daniel, Benjamin, Jr., and Samuel, Jr., were of the other original family, and settled in various places, some on the Lake-Shore road and in Alton. Daniel Torsey settled near the mountain, in the south part of the town, but was reduced, and for long years lived at the almshouse, and died aged. Henry and Alva Tucker are in the list. The latter was a mechanic at Meredith Bridge. He was a man of ability and good standing. Henry Wadleigh came to town with Esquire Benjamin Weeks in 1787. He was son-in-law to Esquire Weeks, and settled near him, and worked at blacksmithing. He had sons, William and Benjamin, who also worked at the blacksmith trade, and the latter also at stone-cutting, and has had important official positions, and is a skilled workman. The family is still represented in the third and fourth generations.

David Watson, of Meredith, cleared land in Gilford, near the Gunstock River and the present village, and began building in 1798. His sons, Jonathan and Job, lived on the place. Jonathan also subsequently lived near the Locklin, in the Swain house, and at length moved back to Meredith. His son, David, of Boston, was born in Gilford, and has been long in business in Boston. Job occupied the estate in 1811, and had a large family. Two sons, John and Charles, graduated at Bowdoin College and at Union Seminary, and have labored in various places. David became a carpenter, learned his trade in Lowell, and worked there some years, and, later, at Laconia, where he lives now. The daughters are settled in different places, and have been well connected. Others bearing the name have at times resided in the town.

John Webster, in 1806, and Dudley Webster, in 1812, are taxed; supposed to dwell near Malachi Davis, and at a time near Jackson's meadow.

The Weeks families are large and of special importance in the history of the town, both in its earlier stages and in its more recent course. Benjamin Weeks, Esq., as has been said, came to this part of the town in 1787. He had lost a barn and stock of hay in the Lower Parish a little before by fire. His father had died about the same time in Greenwood, N. H., and left not much property. He moved to Barton for two or three years, and returned without success, in 1792. He bought land largely, and sold many pieces, and had four hundred or five hundred acres. His older brother, John, came with him and lived near by, towards Jonathan Sanborn's, and died in 1816, aged about eighty-four years. Deacon Noah Weeks, another brother, came about the same time, and settled to the southwest of him, on Liberty Hill, or its vicinity. Esquire Weeks had six sons and one daughter, all born in the last quarter of the last century. He aided them in education and to commence trade. Daniel, the oldest, began trade in 1801 at the home place; Elisha, the third son, began trade there in 1802; Matthias, the second son, studied law, and ran the tan-yard awhile; and William attended the academy at Gilmanton, fitted for college and graduated, and, being feeble in health, went South, and taught a few years, and died in 1810, probably the first one from this town, or its territory, who graduated at college, which was in 1806. Benjamin and Levi R. also engaged in trade in their early life. Sally married Henry Wadleigh, and was inclined to literary life, but died early. From these were a large community of active, enterprising citizens. Elisha settled in Stratford; Levi R. moved to other places; and from Benjamin's and Daniel's families, each large, came a number of tradesmen, and a good share of the business in this part of the town has been done by them. The family of Deacon Noah—viz.: Noah, Ira and Mathias—have also been of honorable career, and have been marked for piety and honesty.

The Whittier family are also of honorable mention and important. Deacon Andrew Whittier came and settled early near Daniel Hoyt's. He was a man of influence, and raised a family who were among the enterprising men of former days. Timothy succeeded to the homestead. Jonathan settled nearly on the north, and was a wheelwright and framer. He afterwards built and operated a mill, including grist-mill, thresher and carriage-shop. Andrew wrought at shoemaking nearer the village, and at later times lived, and died at his father-in-law's, Abel Hunt's. Moses and Henry settled on the Oaks road, near the Upper Weirs. Moses was a mechanic, but Henry was a farmer, and had no family.

John Weymouth is taxed in 1813; and Charles Willey, who lived near Governor's Island; and Jacob, at Lake village; and Job Wilson and Benning Wilkinson, concerning whom little is known; also Jeremiah Young, of uncertain location and history. Dr. I. K. Young preached only a short time in the church at Meredith Bridge, while it stood on the Gilford side. Samuel York lived on the Intervale and had sons and daughters.

These constitute the inhabitants till time brought in new ones.

The Topography of the Town.—The form of the plat is, in a measure, determined by the water frontage and the terminal mountain run. It would have been nearly rhomboidal, but for the truncation of the southeast corner, which was rendered advisable by reason of such section, by the line of the watershed upon a continuous chain of eminences. The only line that seems not determined by some natural feature is on the southwest, and is there in coincidence with the ranges of hundred-acre lots and lies between the eleventh and twelfth ranges—a detachment of a portion of the eleventh range, near Winnesquam was made only a few years ago and annexed to Gilford, and still later that same, with the adjacent portion of the twelfth range and several of the southernmost lots of the second division of forty-acre lots and with the common lots, was detached from Gilford and annexed to Laconia). About two-thirds of the territory of the town lies on the northern slope, and is drained directly into the lake. The other one-third slopes to the west, and is drained by short water-courses into the river at Lake village, Laconia village and Winnesquam. There are only four inland natural ponds and these of small dimensions, and are the sources of as many streams, which flow in three valleys in the town. The first is at the southeast border of the town, nearly on the division line, and while it has little or no basin of drainage, discharges any overflow in an almost indistinguishable outlet into the Suncook River. Proverbially, it is said to have no outlet or inlet, but catches and holds the rain fall on the surface and narrow terminal rim, and overflowing when this is in excess of its capacity. It abounds with horned pouts. The second is a little pool on the Miles River, near its source. It was largely increased in extent, at one time, by flowage in consequence of the dam at Foster's mill, which is no longer kept up. The third is a small circular pond on the west side of the town, which abounds in lilies (hence called the Lily Pond), and also produces a species of leeches. With a very slight fall, it discharges its water through Black Brook (so called) into the bog at the Plains (so called) above Lake village. The fourth is near the centre of the town, and is known as the Saltmarsh Pond, being near the residence of Thomas Saltmarsh, a prominent citizen of Gilmanston, and afterwards one of the first Board of Selectmen of Gilford. It is larger than the other three, and also abounds with lilies and the horned pout, and discharges its waters through Jewett's Brook into the river above the falls at Laconia.

Besides the Winnipiseogee, or Merrimack, on the western side of the town, and by reason of the annexation recently of a portion of land detached from Laconia, also flowing now through a part of the town, there are seven other streams in or adjoining the town, and these, though mostly inconsiderable in size, furnish considerable hydraulic power. The most eastern rises and flows a short distance in Gilford, and then, flowing along the Alton line, passes finally into that town, and enters the lake at West Alton. It was not made much use of for motive-power, except in its lower courses in Alton. Its two branches drain the extreme eastern part of the town. The second is of greater volume, and rises near the Suncook Pond, and flows north through a deep and rapidly-descending valley-bottom to the lake, and is called Miles River, or Leavitt's Brook, taking its name from two men by the name of Leavitt, Miles and Samuel, who had mills on it. It drains the eastern side of Mount Major and Gunstock and the western side of Mount Prospect. Foster's and Colby's mills were also on this stream; only Colby's is now operated.

The third and still larger is the Gunstock, which extends through the entire length of the town from south to north. It drains the western side of the former mountains, and also Mount Minor, the northern side of Liberty Hill, and the eastern slope of Meeting-House Hill, or Gunstock Hill.

The valley of the Gunstock is broad in parts and contains some of the best land in the town. Midway in its course Gilford village is situated, where, in a narrow gorge, the mills are situated, and the power is great, and the fall abrupt for a half-mile. Six mills have been located on this stream, and its lower waters course sluggishly through a plain of about one mile square, of alluvial formation and exceedingly fertile. A small stream, called the Meadow Brook, or Black Brook, courses through an arm of this plain, which is known as the Intervale, and enters the lake near the mouth of the Gunstock. This stream has no fall, and is more of a creek than a river. These rivers at certain seasons abound with the sucker, which comes up from the lake to spawn, in the manner of herring.

The stream flowing from the Lily Pond, by the raising of the dam across the rapids in the Winnipiseogee at Lake village, and the consequent flowage, has been rendered an inlet of Long Bay up half its course, and there is no hydraulic power on this stream.

The sixth stream has about three miles course and several small tributaries. Its main branch, in its upper course, has good power. Collins' mill is on it. It drains a section of the town extending nearly to the centre, in the direction of the Gully and the northwest slope of Liberty Hill. Its lower course is without much fall, and passes through some excellent farms, and reaches the river between bogs above the falls at Laconia village, in the original Samuel Jewett estate. It is called the Jewett Brook there, but Collins' Stream in that part where their mill is located, and where it issues from Saltmarsh Pond, or, as it is sometimes called, Chattleborough Pond. On the Gully branch lies an old meadow, called, formerly, the Jackson, or the Smith's meadow, owned first by I. R. Smith, of Meredith, and later by his daughter, Mrs. Jackson, and also by H. Bagbee and others.

The seventh stream rises in the southwest part of the town, and in the edge of Gilmanton (now Belmont), and one branch of it near Cotton's Hill, and also receives the waters of the north slope of Ladd's Hill, in Belmont. Passing the Province road, it courses through the plain in the southwest part of the village of Laconia, and falls into the Winnesquam at its southeast angle. It was called the Durkey Brook, and on its banks, near its mouth, there was a spring, once reputed to be mineral and medicinal. Some use of its power is made near the Concord stage road.

The great river, Winnipiseogee, has, or had, three places of power: At the Weirs, or Prescott's Mills, by wing-dams, three feet of head was utilized; but flowage has ruined this privilege and it has long been in disuse. At Lake village a single head of twenty feet gives great power, and it has, from the first, been well used. The Lower Falls, at Laconia, has also a single head of some greater height. The current, however, is not quite all utilized, the river proper being here nearly a mile in length from bog to bog, in the natural state, or level.

The altitude of the surface of the town is also remarkable. There are four elevated portions that receive the title of mountains, and four that bear particular names as hills, besides some lesser hills that bear no names unless those known only to the immediate locality. The most elevated portion, in the eastern part of the town, is called Mount Major, or, on the chart (nautical), Gunstock Mountain. Its summit is about two thousand six hundred feet above the level of the lake, and that level is five hundred feet above the sea-level; hence, it is three thousand feet high. From its summit the surface of the ocean, off Portsmouth, can be seen, by the unaided eye, under the morning sun. It has been a surveyor's post, in the triangulation of the Atlantic region, for the purpose of making a chart of the coast. The United States government had property in monument signals, on it, and for a series of years occupied its apex as a signal and surveying-station, furnishing it with instruments and manning it with operators. It commands a view of the greater part of the State and a part of Maine. Its highest part is not wooded, and from it are seen some twenty-five bodies of water.

Mount Gunstock, locally so called (and sometimes Suncook, and still again, sometimes Peaked Mountain), is the next in altitude, but of some three hundred feet less elevation. It stands to the northwest of Mount Major. It is in the western slope of this, in a ridge running down the mountain, that the mine of iron ore is situated, it being a trap of some two feet in width, and extending downward and inward, and has once been worked. It is protoxide and peroxide of iron, in the proportion to make magnetic ore. It is, in some of its parts, eighty-five per cent. pure iron, and a well-formed horse-shoe nail has been made from it, directly, on the anvil, without going through the process of smelting. A road was built to it by the mining company some sixty years ago, but is not now used. By a circuitous route, the summit of the mountain can be almost attained by vehicle, and the remainder of the journey made on horseback or on foot. This summit was once much used for purposes of celebration. In one Presidential campaign an ox was dressed here and served, roasted whole, to a large assemblage of people,—a mass-meeting. A spur or wing of highland extends from this northward and abuts the lake in a bold headland, and is the ridge separating the valleys of the Miles and the Gunstock Rivers.

Mount Minor, sometimes called the Piper Mountain, is the next in elevation, and stands to the southwest of Mount Major as a spur in the direction of the line of hills that extends through the town of Gilmanton. This mountain is some eight hundred feet less in height than Mount Major, and forms a descending slope without much valley between them, as is not the case between Mount Major and Gunstock. A spur runs from Mount Major to the northeast, into Alton, in the line of Suncook Pond, and its ridge is the dividing line of Gilmanton, and is sometimes called Morse's Mountain. These highlands cover about one-third of the town, and have been heavily wooded at times. Parts of this tract were subsequently cleared, and parts, at different periods, were burnt over by forest-fires. The whole tract, as far as it is cleared, is excellent grazing-land for sheep.

The lesser elevations, called by distinctive names as hills, are, first, Liberty Hill, a cultivated plateau, about nine hundred feet above the lake-level, and commanding a complete view of the western part of the lake and the northwest part of the town and the more distant highlands and towns. It contains some excellent farms, but is not so extensively cultivated on its southern part as it was formerly. A road cuts another road at right-angles at the highest point, where a liberty-pole once stood.

Cotton's Hill is on the border of Gilmanton (now Belmont), and is an isolated peak. Its northern slope is a gentle incline and contains excellent farms. Its southern and western declivities are more abrupt and the soil is less arable. It is crowned with a stately growth and is a conspicuous object from all directions, and beautiful for its symmetry.

Gunstock Hill, across the Gunstock Valley, and opposite Gunstock Mountain, is a long ridge, somewhat in the line of a detached section, called Boyd's Hill, and of the Lochlin, and extends north and south on the west side of the valley of that name, and is the eastern limit of the second division of forty-acre lots in the original survey. It was selected for the site of the first church, built in 1792, and is sometimes called Meeting-House Hill. Here it was that the first settlers intended to make the town and fix the centre and the pivot of all affairs; but, with water-power on either side and none there, it was the manifest destiny to yield to the valleys. This, at first, was the most improved part of the town, and, as far as excellency of glebe was concerned, it was not a bad choice.

Other highlands received particular and local appellations, from ownership or adjacent dwellers, save one, in the Miles Valley, called Cobble Hill, which is a conical pile between the two arms of the river, very symmetrical in shape and rising to about five hundred feet from the surrounding lands, like an artificial mound, and is of about one mile in circuit at its base. It is grazing-land, and beautiful to behold from valley or surrounding mountain brows. By slight change in the height of the flowage of the river, its waters would flow on the opposite side of the hill, and into the other branch.

The grades of soil and wood-growths are worthy of mention. A section adjacent to the river, or the west side, is mainly a strong, rocky soil, and produces a hardwood growth, with a slight exception of the plain near Black Brook. The northern part of this belt is called the Oaks road, and Oaks District. It produced a peculiarly good variety of white oak, much sought after by wheelwrights for use in their craft. The more remote belt from the river was of a lighter soil, and produced a pine growth. This was of superior quality.

It was a stately forest, and extended from the lake-shore up the Gunstock Valley to the base of Liberty Hill. In it the royal brand might have been seen,—perhaps, destiny—fixing some of the mammoth forms for the royal navy-yards. From these, in the plain of the upper Gunstock, the first settlers practiced the art of turpentine gathering as a source of income.

These on that particular plot were early manufactured into the superior lumber of those days, which is now the wonder of those who witness the demolition of the original houses and buildings. The huge radical remains of these, seemingly imperishable in the soil, were cleared by a mechanical device called stump-wheels, which were constructed of some fifteen or twenty feet in height, with a revolving axle of great diameter and strength, from which a cable chain, of great size and strength, passed under and around a principal root, over which the wheels were set; and then the third wheel, fixed on the axle, with a chain wrapping it in a groove in the rim, to which chain the team was attached, and by a deploying advance wound up the cable and lifted the stump. Thus the ground was cleared and broken in, and now is some of the finest lots in this part. The third belt produces a hardwood growth, and is a rocky but loamy soil, with a clay subsoil and excellent for agricultural uses. It rises into the elevated parts, where there is a mixture of stately spruce and some inferior variety of oak. The average soil is best for grasses and native crops. There are partial or limited deposits of clay and of sands. The present town and county boundary is in mid-lake, but originally the grant was limited by the shore-line of the lake, river and bays, including no islands. Governor's Island, long known also as Davis' Island, and connected to the mainland by a bridge built by the owner of the island, was annexed to the town at a later period. It contains about five hundred acres of land of a very superior quality. It was formerly covered with a very heavy growth of timber, pine at the eastern extremity and hardwood on the western portion. This is not the original grant or share of Gilmanton, reserved for the Governor, as that share was laid out to Governor Shute, in the centre of the original town, and at the north extreme of the upper one hundred acre lots, and just to the west of Young's Pond, a rectangular plot of five hundred acres. But this island received its name from Governor Wentworth's taking a fancy to it. Another island on which were buildings built and a farm improved, and known as Welch Island, is also included within Gilford limits. Other smaller and unimportant islands—as Locke's, Timber and Mark—are associated with the south shore and contain excellent grazing land, and are in parts well stocked with timber-growth, and are valuable.

The system of ways or roads was provided for in the original laying out of the town by reserved range-ways and sideways at intervals in the setting out of the ranges and lots. Yet these, in a measure, were found to be so located as to be both inconvenient for use and impracticable for construction; and yet many of the roads correspond quite nearly to the old range-ways, and the original lots preserve, for the most part, the original form and entirety, so that from many eminences the view shows the quadrangular subdivisions of the whole territory.

The road designed to accommodate the first and second tiers of forty-acre lots was built within, or alongside these ranges, from the Weirs to the Province road at the Lower Falls, or the present Laconia. In its lower part it coursed along the river-side and through the land left undivided at the time of the laying out of the five ranges in the original survey, and which, lying between the river border and the second range, was later laid out and designated as the eighth range, the common and the village lots, and corresponded to like supplemental laying out in the upper part nearer the Weirs, which was classed as the sixth and seventh ranges, and a common or gore. On these lands were afterwards built the greater part of the two villages called Lake village and Meredith Bridge (now Laconia) and also a small collection of houses at the Weirs.

A road for the accommodation of the third tier of lots ran parallel to this first road in a most direct course, till half the course was passed over, and then, by reason of the broken surface of the land and the abruptness of its inclines, it deflected to the west and met the first road at Jewett's estate; only patches of it were built and are traceable in the south part of the town.

The third parallel road began a little distance from the lake-shore, at the head of the Intervale, and passed over Gunstock, or Meeting-House Hill; and, instead of crossing the Locklin Hill, deflected to the east and joined with the fourth road, which also began near the lake, on the east side of the Intervale, and ascended Spring Hill, and by some deflections continued past the village and over Liberty Hill to Gilmanton, keeping on the first and second tier of one hundred acre lots through the whole length of the town.

The fifth parallel road, on the third tier of hundred-acre lots, was built along the west base and under the brow of the mountains, from the Gilmanton line nearly through the town, though its last stages were not more than a drift-way. It was broken and disappeared for the last mile or two before reaching the lake, where it would have crossed high hills.

The sixth way was only opened as a bridle-road or cartway up the Miles Valley to near the Skeller Meadow, and then, as a public, traveled road, to the base of the mountains; and in two branches (one of which becomes a substitute for a seventh road, which would pass over Mount Prospect and to the terminal ridge on the south boundary line of the town, and through the Masonian lots). At the base of the mountain it turns to the east and goes to the Alton line, in two branches, as part of an east and west road.

The roads designed to cross these, and run east and west, were fewer in number and not so regular or easily traced, as the lots in different ranges overlapped and were not parallel to the extreme margins or border lines of the town. The first, however, known as the Pond road, was quite direct and continuous along the lake-shore from the Weirs to the Alton line, and was determined more by the natural features of the land than by the division of lots and settlements made.

The second road, in this direction, set off at the Plains, north of Black Brook, and continued to the head of the Intervale, ascended the Ames and the Sawyer Hills, and descended into the Miles Valley, and was deflected round the south end of Mount Prospect, and reached the Alton line as identical with the deflections of the sixth north and south road, and is known as the Mountain road or route.

The third sets off a little north of Lake village and by slight deflections extends to Hoyt's Mills, or Gilford village, and should have passed over the mountain by the Old Stair-Way, a ravine with regular rock formation.

The fourth sets off at Jewett's Corner, and in two branches reaches the mountain bases,—one via Chatleborough and the other by Liberty Hill. A third branch, of a later laying out, reaches Gilford village by the Gully route (so called). These, with later alterations constitute the road system of the town. The sharpness of the hills, in the roads, has given occasion for the re-location of many roads, around the hills, in different parts of the town.

While this system of roads and cross-roads was all provided for in the plan and survey of the town, they were laid out at different times, as necessity required, and in separate sections when demanded. The oldest road is, of course, the Gilford portion of the Province road, laid out as a State or colony road by the General Court in 1770, and committed to Gilmanton for construction through its own territory; but, on its refusal to build it, it was built by contractors engaged by the colony government, and the cost, three hundred and thirty-one pounds, assessed on the town. It had to be repaired and the bridge rebuilt in 1790, at town expense. The roads of the town have usually been built by direct individual assessment, and worked out by all the tax-payers of the town, but repaired and kept in order by a system of district supervision and taxation, the town being divided into some thirty highway districts.

Portions of highways were at first made by individuals for their own convenience, and on their own lands, without any formal laying out; while to others there are records of legal laying out by proper authorities. Among those returned are the following—an incomplete list, but showing the progress of settlement: In 1782, one by Abel Hunt's. In 1785, one from Peaslee Rodgers' to Noah Weeks', one to Folsom's Mills and to Simeon Hoyt's and one from Samuel Smith's to Meredith Bridge. In 1787, on Thomas Foster's (Intervale) to the pond, etc.,—i. e., on the Pond road. At the same date, from Ebenezer Smith's to the Gunstock Mills,—i. e., through via Spring Hill and Kelley Corner, though possibly a mill-road through the pine woods lot. The present road, by the tannery and carding and fulling-mill, was of a much later laying and building.

The older approach by traveled road was by Potter's Hill to the mills. In 1788, one from the Province road to Simeon Hoyt's, probably the middle road from Liberty Hill south. In 1789, one from Philbrook Rand's to David Clough's, that is, over Gunstock or Meeting-House Hill, to Thomas Hoyt's (now Mr. Roger's.) Also one from David Ames' (R. Dame's) to Thomas Frohock's (late D. Y. Smith's), and one from Josiah Sawyer's to Ephraim Brown's. In 1790, one from Levi Gilman's to the Gunstock road. In 1792, one from Samuel F. Gilman's, via Ezekiel Gilman's (Zebedee Morrill's) to Jacob Jewett's (Deacon Isaac's), doubtless to meet a road already made from the Province road past Samuel Jewett's, the next house. In 1794, one by Daniel Hoyt's and one from Samuel Gilman's (3d) to Samuel Gilman's. In 1797, one from Jeremy Rowe's to Samuel Thurston's, in the south part of the town. In 1799, one from William Hunt's to Josiah Tilton. In 1800, one from Jeremy Rowe's to Meredith Bridge, and one from Thomas Foster's to James Ames', across the Intervale, in 1801. Also in the same year, one from John Smith's to the Upper Weirs. In 1803, one from David Hale's to the Great Weirs (Lake village). In the same year, one on Governor's Island to Nathaniel Davis'. In 1805, from J. Smith's to the Great Weirs, probably by Malachi Davis'. In 1807, from David Gould's to Joseph Potter's, and in 1808, one from D. Hale's to the Weirs (Oaks road), and from A. Jackson's to Samuel Thurston's (via the Collins neighborhood), and one more in 1812, from Bartholomew Gale's to Meredith Bridge. A few others, omitted here, make up most of the roads of the town.

The bridges of the town, except a few of the larger and more costly, have been built by the districts. The only bridge on the Miles River, of much expense and difficulty, was the one at Miles Leavitt's, which went down-stream in a freshet, with the mill also, which was rebuilt higher up-stream. The one at the town farm has also been damaged at times by the overflow of the stream. There are eleven bridges spanning the Gunstock, several of which have been carried away in high water. Three are on the Intervale, and that whole surface is overflowed in times of freshet. Two are at Copp's Mill and of recent construction; one at the fulling-mill; one at the tannery; two at the saw-mill and Village road; one at Whittier's Mill, often damaged; and one at Esquire Weeks' residence. The bridges on the Winnipiseogee, including railroad bridges, are now ten in number, and expensive structures.

Providence road bridge is the oldest, and has been three times rebuilt, and is now a substantial structure. The first was a rude affair and short-lived. The bridge at Folsom's Mills was built in 1782, and has been two or three times repaired, or substantially rebuilt. The raising of the water-level by the new dam necessitated the construction of a bridge of greater height and firmer build. There has been added, in later years, another bridge near where the old footway on the dam was. The railroad crosses the stream above these and again twice at the Lower Falls, or Laconia. The Weirs bridge was built in 1803, and has been twice rebuilt and raised higher, to allow passage to steamers under it, in the river channel. The channel was cut deeper some years ago, and recently the United States government has appropriated money for the improvement of the passage into and out of the lake.

The second bridge was built at Laconia, on Mill Street, and has twice been rebuilt. It is just below the dam, and indispensable, though its approach from Lake Street or the Gilford side was difficult. The third bridge there, on Church Street, was built about 1850, and was unfinished for some years. Meredith laid her road to the river centre and built the bridge to that point. Gilford endeavored to defeat the building of the road and bridge, and refused to proceed in its construction. But at length the project succeeded, and the street and bridge is now much used. The Messar bridge, at the upper point of the narrows, or at the foot of Little Bay, was also strenuously opposed, as likewise the filling above it, which was deemed impracticable at first, and stoutly opposed. The bridge in the lower part of the village is of recent construction, but was found a desideratum by reason of the expansion of the village in that direction and the increase of business in that part. The bridge leading to Governor's Island was built in 1820, and mainly by the owners of the island. Its support being expensive, they asked the town's support of it, and the town at length assumed it. It is about thirty rods from shore to shore. Two natural formations project on the opposite sides and make a natural fitness for the place of a bridge. It was built by sinking a structure of logs in square sections and filled with stone, the greatest depth being about twenty-five feet, and there is left an open pass-way, not in the deepest part of the channel, of some fifteen feet width, through which row-boats, if small, may pass. The filling of stone on each side of the bridge renders it enduring against the action of the waves.

The Industries of the Town.—The main pursuits of the inhabitants of Gilford have been agricultural; and yet various other pursuits have also been followed, and the mingled interests of these projects have held the attention of those who were ready for any undertaking that evidently might be profitable or honorable to the projector.

While agriculture has been engaged in by most of the people, it has been conducted with varying wisdom, and been variously successful in different departments thereof, and in different times. The soil, varying much in its productive power, and its special adaptation to particular growths, is, on the whole, good and remunerative. There are sections in the highlands of the east part that are particularly adapted to grazing, and there wool-raising has been one principal object, and its ends attained without great difficulty. On the higher parts of the mountains the native grasses are unmixt with the baser or inferior grasses of the wet lowlands, and are more concentrated, nourishing and sweet-flavored. Hence, sheep seek these places, both for the coolness of the air or refreshing breezes and for the abundance and richness of the feed. There they fatten, and yield their fibre, which brings in a good income to the investor and cultivator. Formerly, each and every farmer had his limited stock of sheep; and it was thought to be an absolute necessity to the proper exercise of good husbandry to have a little store of wool for domestic manufacturing, and a little stock of mutton in a well-replenished larder. The surplus above home demand in these two items of flock-growth sought the market for revenue, or exchange for other necessities, or, perchance, for the mere glory of laudable and successful production. In response to this usual, known and tempting venal store, the far-seeing wool-monger was sure to be on hand at the fit season, and with the proper ore in sack or wallet, intent on a commercial raid. There is one "lost art," or lost sight, in these days of steam and vapor: that is, the old-time drover, in his long blue frock,—a professional uniform, half-driving and half-walking, and riding anon; and collecting from farm-yard to farm-yard, till his bleating throng and lowing host fill the way, resembling a crusading army; and when the muster is complete, taking up the long, tedious pilgrimage, in one line of march, from the Aquadoeton hill-sides and sheep-cots to the noisy sale-yards and slaughter-houses of that far-famed and bloody Brighton.

The meritorious generalship of such a campaign was for no ordinary man. The special commission for this royal order fell to the lot of such meat-men as Nathan, Jeremiah (called Jed.) and Asa Bachelder, Thomas Sewell, William Sargent, Nathan Bartlett and a few others, and in the later days, John O. Sanborn, Harrison Gilman, Joseph Sanborn, Jr., John Weeks, Carroll Follet, Ladd & Co. and a few others, who now are content to skirmish a little at short-range and on the offensive. While the old stock variety was generally raised, an improved variety of fine-wooled stock was kept in the mountain region by principally the Weeks Brothers & Sons. This merino wool was very superior for fine cloth-making, and brought a very high price in the market,—sometimes as high as a dollar per pound, and nearly double that of the common-stock wool. But as the sheep were of a diminutive size bodily, each one yielded a less quantity both of fleece and meat, and they were less remunerative for the purposes of food or clothing; and so merino wool-culture declined.

In later years, still another species was generally kept, of greater size, and producing a staple of coarser and longer fibre. But the extent of sheep and wool-raising has grown less of late, by reason of lower prices of wool, though the less value in the fleece has been offset by higher prices for the lambs and the mutton.

In the line of stock-raising, the production of beef is and has been an important branch of business.

The ridges of land devoted to pasturage were well adapted to neat-cattle-feeding, and produced beef of an excellent quality, and gave abundant thrift to the stock so devoted. In the earlier years, in times of less demands for meats, with less population, and greater production of feeding, a large surplus of beef was sent to market by drift. Stock was kept less sumptuously at the barns, and in winter seasons, and almost universally, beef was grass-fed and young, and less expensively produced for the market.

The average farmer depended on his neat-stock sold for the greater amount of cash needed to meet obligations and procure other means of living. Nearly all the yearly increase of live-stock by generation was kept, and little slaughter of the young was tolerated. Veal was a rarity on the table of the farmer or the inn.

The dairy interests were important, and were mostly for distant markets. Cheese-making was as extensive as butter-making. The better farmer was accustomed to take his ox-load of butter and cheese in the fall season, and draw it to Portsmouth, and exchange them for West India goods,—that is, for sugar, salt, and perchance a cask of "the ardent," and fish. The lesser farmer had to obtain these through the medium of the common store, and make the home-made spruce beer and domestic cider answer for the more costly and stronger drinks of the gentlemen. In those days, at about every tenth house was the cider-mill; and hence, the demand for the cooper's service was immense. This craft, as far as the making, or rather, the repairing, of cider-casks was concerned, was carried on in a decidedly unique manner.

About the time of the apple-picking and cider-making, in November, a set of craftsmen took up the march, and went the rounds of the neighborhood, to renew the hoops on the casks needed, and merrily indeed was the music of the cooper's whack, ringing over the hills. Cider was scarcely a commodity for market; either it was considered too sacred to be bartered, or it was not sufficient in quantity for more than the limit of home consumption. Improved fruit, or its culture, was quite largely undertaken some years ago; and both new orchards were set from grafted nurseries, and old orchards were grafted. Very limited attempts were made to propagate or cultivate other fruits. The cherry, the plum and pear were considered as the luxury of the favored few. Sugar-making, from the maple, has been engaged in only to a small extent, and that in a diminishing proportion.

Poultry-raising has always been engaged in to a considerable extent, and in greater variety formerly. The vigil-keeping goose and the turkey have had their day, but are fast disappearing. The former is almost unknown, and the latter scarce. The hen is current, but egg-production was never extensive.

Other animals were sometimes kept, not entirely for profit, or for executing undertakings, but more particularly for convenience and fancy. The horse was thought to be as necessary to a complete furnishing of the barn-yard as the dog or cat was to the complete house. But yet some business was done in raising horses for the market or to sell. And now and then more than the one "domestic horse" graced the barn-yard of the more opulent; and, perchance, was spared to supply the needed horse-power in those days of stage-coaches, or even to supply and serve the desire and passion of the rich and those indulging in pride-show. An exception, perhaps, may be taken in pork-producing, for though the keeping of swine was for domestic ends, to furnish the home larder, yet many a dressed porker found its way to Portsmouth market, and later into other cities, whither trade was subsequently directed, and sent back in lieu of it the daintier luxuries of commerce or clean cash. In earlier times wheat-raising was quite extensive and fairly profitable. But from about 1830 this crop became oftentimes uncertain or a failure, by reason of the weevil-fly, whose ravages were great after the decrease of the native clover-growth, in which they had before that worked and spent their fury. Hence, gradually the wheat-culture declined, and the crop became insufficient to meet demands, and is now almost absolutely a thing of the past, and not likely to be revived. It was a rare thing in former times for a farmer to buy a barrel of flour. It was considered evidence of miserable husbandry, and a sure omen of ill success, or a failing fortune, or a precursor to a financial ruin. Likewise the corn crop was abundant and extensively put on the market. But very little of it was used for stock-feeding, either in their ordinary keeping or for their fattening. The surplus above home consumption and local supply of the domestic market was not inconsiderable. The oat crop and the potato crop were also in excess of home consumption, and became articles of merchandise in the market. The cultivation of flax was formerly extensive, and now is unknown. As a general rule, each farmer had his plot annually sown, and its yield carefully secured, properly treated or cured and well stored. And in due time it was manufactured,—the seed into linseed oil, which was once successfully and extensively done at Meredith Bridge, and the fibre to the stage of the dressed hank, or thread, or the fabric. The diminutive linen foot-wheel, and the larger tow-wheel, also usable for wool-spinning, were the absolutely necessary and commendable articles of outfit to the then diligent housewife. The factory was not then on the water-courses, but the substitute was on all the hill-sides. Home-made fabrics of wool and flax, and to some extent of even cotton, were the almost universal supply for apparel and house-furnishing, and somewhat for the market. The blithe, sweet-singing maid of those days, standing at the helm of her new-improved,¹ Shaker-made patent spinning-wheel, was in her dignity, and when the accredited stent of four skeins daily of seven knots, each containing twenty double threads, on an honest reel, was got off, and in good season in the afternoon, she was in her felicity, having earned the title of "clever girl" or "spinster."

The diligence of all the members of the family made it no onerous service to provide adequate raiment and other textile furnishing for the household. The house was a busy place, and resonant with the hum of the spindle, the rattle of the whacking-loom and the hundred processes of domestic labor.

One industry in the agricultural department deserves mention, and that was the silk-culture. About 1840 the mulberry-tree was cultivated on the light soil in the Gunstock Valley above Gilford Village, having been planted and introduced by Mr. Benjamin Rowe. The silk-worm grub was obtained and fed by the mulberry leaf, and a successful product of the silk cocoons was realized. These were sold unreeled, and the manufacturing of the silk of commerce from these was done elsewhere. An enthusiasm in this new industry was for a time quite extensively shared by the people possessing light soils, which were pronounced to be especially adapted to the mulberry culture; but the enterprise, though not fruitless, was not extended, and for a want of interested, enterprising operators, the scheme was not long prosecuted, and the silk-producing interests ceased. A few remaining trees only indicate the former attempt. From the "light infantry" of domestic manufactory we proceed to notice some of the "heavy artillery" of man-operated machinery. And first of these is the saw-mill. Lumber-making has been practiced since the settlement of the town, but only at first to meet existing necessities in the first building of dwellings. In later years much lumber has been manufactured for the general market. The saw-mills at first were mainly for producing boards and plank. The first dwellings were covered with shingles and clapboards made by hand, being rived and shaved by the farmer in his leisure days. Afterwards sawn shingles were used, but were vastly inferior. The saw-mills of the town have been the following: Lamprey's, near Alton line, which was abandoned forty years ago. It was operated by a small and inadequate stream, and only survived to meet a local need at that time. Foster's mill was built after Lamprey's went to disuse, and was to supply its place in the interests and demands of that part of the town. It also was inappropriately located, and proved unsuccessful, and ran but a few years. A large tract of heavily-wooded land in that section of the town was subsequently cleared, and its timber was manufactured into lumber by steam-power, and the lumber marketed. Colby's mill, on the same stream, the Miles River, was built after the disuse of Foster's, but was more the successor of the Leavit mill, which had been twice built and carried away, the first being a grist-mill, and the second for sawing, and the third now in use, for both sawing lumber and also shingles, and lately for threshing, besides. On the same stream, below, was the ancient Brown & Leavit mill, for sawing, not now in operation.

One of the earliest mills for sawing lumber was that built on the Gunstock stream by Simeon Hoyt and Esquire Ebenezer Smith, in 1789. As this was erected at the waterfall included in one of the public shares or the ministerial lot, it was subject to some conditions and limitations, and the permission of the use of the waterfall and adjacent lands was granted to these two gentlemen in 1788, to extend fifteen years, and conceding the right to clear and occupy for their mill-yard two acres, and on both sides of the river. They are also bound not to unnecessarily cut timber on the adjacent lots and to remove the mill at the expiration of the lease, or to sell it to the town; and, meantime, to give free right to saw on the part of the people any material desired for a meeting-house in that part of the town. This mill was then the only one in that heavily-wooded section. It was the source of all the board and plank-stock of that part, and shared, with other parts, the general patronage of the whole region. There was not much sawing of timber, that being almost always hewn. The mill was not removed nor sold to the town; but the encroachments on the public lot being so frequent and easy, the whole lot was sold and the proceeds of the sale invested for the benefit of the ministry. The mill, with the lot, was bought by Bernard Morrill, and it has been owned and run by him and his son until the present time. The flowing of the meadows above the village, while owned by parties not operating the mill, was limited to the 20th of May yearly, when the mill must stop; but by a single ownership, both of the mill and meadow, the flowing, and, consequently, the business of the mill, was afterward unrestricted as to times and seasons.

This mill has been operated by employed men at most times and has not often been idle for want of work on hand when there was a water supply, and it has been the source of a good income to the owners and operators. It has been several times damaged by freshets and substantially rebuilt, and, in later time, has been furnished with circular instead of upright saws. The greater part of an immense forest of timber in the Gunstock Valley and western mountain slopes has been converted into lumber at this mill, and thence taken to market or used in building in this vicinity.

It has been an appreciated accommodation to the public and a source of revenue to the owners and the class of men to whom its business furnished employment, and who lived upon the results of their engagement in its operation.

About 1835 a movement was made to build a mill on the lower part of the stream, near the only remaining large tract of pine timber land. This was built by Joseph Potter on his land, and under the foremanship of Mr. Bacheider (called Boston John). Mr. Potter and son entered upon the business of the manufacturing of lumber, including shingles and clapboards and lath. The mill was operated many years, mainly by John M. Potter, and was afterwards sold to Hazen Copp, who built dwelling-houses near by, and is still operated by his son, Augustus Copp. Facilities for grinding corn were added recently, and it has cut the entire growth of heavy pine timber in its vicinity into marketable lumber. It was only after years of endeavor and repeated trials that the dam was made permanent and substantial.

The location of the mill was, at first, on no public road, and it necessitated the laying and maintaining of the Valley road past it, and from the Intervale to the Fulling-mill route or road, involving two bridges over the stream. Shingle-sawing was early added to wool-carding and fulling, at the Mingo Fulling-Mill, and is still carried on by Deacon Heman Hunter. The same business has been carried on there by the successive owners, Meshech Sanborn, Christopher Gilman, Benjamin Gilman and others.

There were two mills at the Weirs—one on either side of the river. The Prescott Mill there gave name to the place for a time, as it was currently denominated "Prescott's Mills" as well as Weirs. The head was so slight at this point that the power was small, notwithstanding the great volume of supply of water and its being constant; hence the privilege was considered as unimprovable and of little value, so that it naturally fell into disuse, and, later, the heightening of the dam at Lake village destroyed the privilege altogether, and so both mills ceased long ago.

The lumber manufacture was extensive at the falls at the foot of the bay. Here Abraham Folsom built in 1780, and the mill has been in nearly continuous operation for more than one hundred years. He also built and operated a grist-mill, and another saw-mill was afterwards built on the east side of the river, then called, by way of distinction, the "Gilford side," and was called at a time Bachelor's Mill, and again Lyford's Mill, and by the name of other owners or operators. In it the experiment was made of running a gang of saws, without good success.

These mills have largely been supplied with a stock of logs from the lake and bay, by being rafted from places on the borders of the same. These mills could do business the year round; whereas the mills on the smaller and variable streams would be capable of operation only in the seasons of the year when the water supply was abundant. This, however, was not altogether unfavorable to the owners, who had other business to prosecute, and the demand for sawing was limited to seasons intervening between the pressing claims of agricultural interests. So great was the volume of lumber manufacturing at Lake village, and proportionally so in excess of all other pursuits and products, that the place became known best by the current designation of "Slab City," and bore that title for a long time. Well might it have been called Log Town, as the river approaches were crowded at nearly all seasons with rafts of logs, floated thither from the lake.

At the season of low-water there was not the desired height of head or quantity of flow into the wing-dams and upon the rival wheels there on the different sides of the river; hence a device was resorted to to effect this matter, viz.: the construction of a sort of submerged breakwater—a curb of plank-work filled with stone, to anchor or ballast it, extending far up the middle of the channel into the current places of the river,—which should divide the flow and direct it in due proportion into the respective mill-ponds, and not suffer it to flow in greater measure to either one side, as it was inclined to do by reason of any obstruction or change of channel.

Competing interests were the foundation of rivalries and jealousies and devices on the part of the actors in the Folsom and the Bachelor enterprises, which, however, gave life and thrill to the business undertakings.

The lumber-mill at the Lower Falls—Meredith Bridge—was subject to just the same local competition; yet it found rivals and antagonists both in the competition of the upper mills and also in the competition of other and diverse interests and enterprises near to it.

In 1780, Colonel Samuel Ladd built his mill as the successor of that of Stephen Gale, who, in the four or five previous years, had been endeavoring to use the water-power at that place and had built a mill on the Meredith side, and had lost his hold on the reservoir by the yielding of his dam-structure to the force of the stream. Fire and flood alike opposed Colonel Ladd's determination, and his works were four times destroyed, but only to be rebuilt and enlarged by his indomitable will and equally-matched courage. He added compass to his undertakings and enjoyed a fair share of patronage in the lumber-making engagements of the time and place, and he even surpassed Folsom in the grinding and flouring patronage of the wide field. This saw-mill continued, till a comparatively recent date, to do its proper work. But it was unfortunately located in regard to its yard-room and its approaches, and hence went into disuse many years ago; and the sawing business at this place has been done since, first, by water-power, on the canal on Laconia side, by Cook & Co. at their sash and door manufactory, and still later, by the same company, by steam-power on the Gilford side, where no inconsiderable amount of lumber-making has been done.

Besides the above enumerated sawing establishments, the Collins mill has been in operation for some years, where the sawing of both lumber and shingle has been prosecuted; and the Whittier mill did gig-sawing and had small circular saws for the cutting-up business in carriage-making.

With these saws Gilford has not only met its own building demands, but has done no small amount of work in furnishing other parts with stock. Its great wooded area and stately forests made this department of industry to be both inevitable and successful, and also inspiring and inviting enterprise. These primitive growths have disappeared before the vigorous lumbermen and made useful under the severe attacking saws; but the broadaxeman's blade played no unimportant part in bringing this beauty and service out of the rough wilderness and unused bower.

A branch of industry akin to lumber-making was formerly prosecuted extensively, viz., stave-making and the associated cooperage. The oak growth of the mountain-sides furnished abundant and excellent materials for making casks of various sizes and uses. These staves were rived on the hill-sides and wrought in the many cooper-shops and transported to the markets far and near. Shooks, for casks of one hundred gallons capacity and upward, were extensively made and sent to the West Indies for the molasses manufacturers. Barrels for fish-packers, beef and pork-packers and for liquors were made and transported to Portsmouth. This work of manufacturing was done principally at the centre of the town, though to some extent in other parts. Jonas Sleeper, Joseph Sanborn, Henry Sleeper, George Wm. Weeks and others engaged extensively in this as a branch of trade and enterprise. Workmen were employed by them both for stave-riving and cask-making. The coopers in business were Nathan Hatch, Ebenezer S. Hunt, Joseph Sanborn & Sons, Samuel & Joshua Gilman, Moses Jewett, David Gould, Ezekiel & Nathan Collins, J. L. Davis, Simeon & Nathaniel Davis and many others. Indeed, the cooper-shop was a common annex to the other buildings of many a place, and Cooper was not an unfrequent prefix to a surname, as, for example, Cooper-Gilman and Cooper-Jewett. The latter emigrated to Cape Cod, where the fish-barrel was in requisition.

The transportation of the manufactured casks was an undertaking of considerable magnitude. The huge load on the mammoth vehicle, drawn fifty miles in two days by stalwart ox-teams, was no trivial matter to carry out; and the sight of these huge moving piles was no tame affair to youthful curiosity and astonishment, as was also the music of the coopers' instruments, deftly handled, to their admiration of the artificers.

The mills for grinding have been erected and operated as follows: Folsom's mill, at the Lake village site. This was first and chiefly used for corn-grinding. In due time a rye crop was raised and was ground in the same set of stones, producing an unbolted meal. Finally, wheat was a product and required bolting, and hence a bolter was added, and it became a flouring-mill of general patronage.

Ladd's mill was successfully run, from 1780, in connection with the saw-mill, which was in the upper story of the building, and the grinding on the lower floor. This mill rivaled the Folsom mill, being more accessible by the main part of the population. There was some competition between the two as to the quantity and quality of flour made from a bushel of farmer's wheat; and so high did the enthusiasm of good millership run at times that it was declared of some that flour was produced and returned from their favorite mill exceeding the weight of the grist taken to the mill. But this must have been to special customers. Yet it must have effectually annulled the tradition that millers were not scrupulously exact in taking only lawful toll, or, at least, it should have proved that Gilford millers were exceptionally honest.

Ladd's mill was succeeded by one built by the factory company, and located farther down-stream and below the factory, or Ticking-Mill (so called). Its capacity was increased by adding two runs of stones and using two bolters. Many farmers used "fine Indian," or bolted corn-meal, as a substitute for wheat-flour, to make a superior bread.

Millers Bachelder and Dimond successively and successfully presided for a full term of service and years at the wheels of the Meredith Bridge Grinding and Flouring-Mill. The universal custom was for each farmer to carry frequent and small grists to the mill, and have them milled for a toll of one-sixteenth, or two quarts on a bushel. Ready-ground meal, or even flour, was at first rarely ever for sale or to be purchased. The toll-grain was on sale, but oftener transported than sold in the place and to residents. The balance of most crops was in favor of exportation or the market, and usually went to the cities, Portsmouth or Boston. In later years the great bulk of milling is that of the stock imported and on sale.

The mill at Gilford village, at the Hoyt's and Smith's privilege, was built not many years after the two other ones at the river. It accommodated the centre and eastern end, to some extent, the southern parts of the town. It did both grinding and bolting, and continued in use till about 1840, or till the building of the tannery at the same dam, and was repeatedly repaired. It is still standing, and has been owned some seventy years by the same parties and the same that owned the saw-mill, viz.: Esq. Bernard and General J. J. Morrill and son. The millers at this mill have been J. Pickering, S. Trefran, W. Meloon, William Knowles, Lowell Sanborn (Deacon Lowell, so called) and others temporarily. At this mill, and at others also, for a limited appointed time in the spring, the yearly stock of gypsum, or plaster of Paris, a cheap fertilizer, was ground, and other grinding was deferred for that period and afterwards resumed. Also, in the last of May usually, a day or two was appropriated to salt-grinding, for dairy uses, which wonderfully accommodated farmers' wives and saved them innumerable poundings of the mortar and pestle, whose music, however, was the delightful matinée of hill and dale, announcing to many a hungry toiler the sure progress of kitchen-work, and, like gong or bell or trumpet, was the first prelude of an unannounced but ready breakfast.

The disuse of the mill at Morrill's left the field open for enterprise. Moreover, the Leavitt mill, on Miles River, had been carried away, and the eastern part of the town was left dependent on some other mill. It was opportune to build.

At this time Jonathan Whiteher built a mill on the Upper Gunstock for grinding and bolting, to which he added also a threshing-machine, a turning-lathe and other machinery for making wheels, carriages and furniture. This mill continued only a few years, and, after repeated damages to its long, weak and expensive dam, and to the mill itself, by freshet, by reason of a want of patronage and its unprofitableness, it ceased to be maintained and was consequently abandoned.

Jeremiah Hunt was in business at this mill for himself in the wheel and furniture interests, and in company in other departments, and was miller at a time. Then the whole of grinding and flouring was centred at Lake village and Laconia, except a little corn-grinding at Copp's mill at a time later. With less cereal products produced, and more imported and used, this is an adaptation both wise and in the line of natural drift. Yet it involves more labor and furnishing, and makes the result less lucrative. The old-time going to mill, with grist on the shoulder or on horseback, has given place to more extended trips in vehicles, light and heavy. The preparation of the grain for the milling state has been variously done. At one time the flail and coursing breezes were all the mediation used. Then the mechanical flanning-mill was resorted to to conquer a calm. Then the separating-mill, or thresher, was used and operated by horse-power and by water-power.

Two styles of the portable horse-power machines were invented and used. One was constructed with a sweep and gearing and rope-tension, operated by horses in draught. The other with a treadle incline and belting, and operated by horse-weight on the treadle. One of the former was owned and operated by a Mr. Bachelder, going from farm to farm. Samuel Blaisdell & Sons owned and operated one of the latter pattern; and still others were brought into parts from adjacent towns. But the inconvenience of so frequent relocation and transportation, and the entertainment of the workmen and horses, was such that the stationary mill, to be operated by water-power, promised better success and speedy introduction; and proved so. Hence, the almost simultaneous construction of two such mills about the year 1835 or 1840,—the first at the Whittier mill and the other at the carding, fulling and shingle-mill, owned by Christopher Gilman, then by Meshech Sanborn, Benjamin Gilman and Hermon Hunter. The same provision for the threshing season was made at the Collins mill and at Meredith Bridge and Lake village, and, later, at Colby's.

The first years these mills were in use the patronage was extensive. Farmers drew their two, five, or ten tons of grain from one to eight miles to have it threshed and returned, each one going at an appointed time. These mills have but little patronage now, and some of them have ceased to be used at all. So little grain is raised that it is not a great task to separate it by hand-flail, or not very unprofitable to feed the oat crop unthreshed. And rye is rarely threshed in this machine, because of the damage to the straw.

Mills for wool-carding and cloth-dressing, were put in, one at Laconia, operated by James Morrison and afterwards by John Buzzell, who, though they lived in Gilford, did their work on the Meredith side. This was discontinued some years ago, on the decline of home-made cloth and yarn, and to give place to their enterprise of cloth-making.

The carding was first done by machinery at the village on the Hoyt's and Smith's mill privilege. Subsequently a mill was built a mile below, at the junction of an eastern branch of the river, and machinery for fulling and dressing and pressing cloth was put in and operated by skilled workmen, and the carding machinery was transferred from Hoyt's mill to this. Fulled cloth for men's wear and the pressed cloth, a kind of flannel, for women's wear, was the general dependence. This mill and work was continued till the fashionableness of satinet came about, and then both the Buzzell's mill at Laconia and the private loom of the farmer's house produced that pattern of fabric. The warp (cotton) for the domestic article was made for many years by Mr. Parker and his children, at the end of the bridge opposite Ladd's grist-mill.

Stephen Chapman was a fuller at Gunstock Fulling-Mill, and others conducted the business for a term, and the business ceased nearly a half-century ago. Later the wool-carding ceased, and neither is now in use.

The Ticking Company was located on the Gilford side, at Meredith Bridge. It was very early in operation, making bed-ticking; while the brick mill made sheetings.

The Ticking, Company of which W. Melcher, Thomas Bobb, Mr. Green and three others were members, was a well-managed and successful firm.

It realized less changefulness than the other companies. Some changes occurred, however, in after-years, both in the personnel of the company and in its business. The new company built more extensively, and changed the machinery from cotton-working to that of wool-working, and from that of cloth-making to that of knitting-works, and are producing hosiery goods in all the mills belonging to the company. The daily products of these mills are immense, and go to commission agents in Boston, and thus are put upon the general trade, and are of a high standard.

The first cotton-mill at Lake village was one of the earliest built, and in near succession to the Avery mill at Meredith Bridge. Later the woolen mill (so called) was built, but not immediately put into operation or furnished with machinery. These were both built on the then Meredith side of the river. The change of the ownership of the property at this place was unfavorable to the development of the interests in manufactures here. The Pingree ownership and management promised better times, but soon left no better condition, and the Locks and Canal Company, while, by a higher dam, it created greater head, left the use of the motive power undeveloped, and rather restricted and retarded expansion at this place. In quite recent years a mill has been built and put into operation on the east side of the river, and is producing hosiery goods. Hosiery was also made at one time in the carding-mill at Gunstock Valley, by Augustus Copp and others; but it did not continue many years.

The foundry industry was early and latterly an important one. The smelting furnace was never completed. It was begun at Folsom's or Bachelder's Mills, and was designed on a grand scale. A huge conical chamber was half-built of stone, and remained in statu quo, unfinished, for a time, and was then finally removed.

Mismanagement and a fatal casualty at the mountain, the distance of transporting the ore and the expensiveness of getting it out, the cost of preparing and running the furnace, so as to compete with other iron-mining companies in the northern part of the State, together with the limitation of capital, proved too great obstacles to the success of the iron-mining project; and hence it was soon utterly abandoned.

But a blast furnace was put into operation for using pig in castings. This industry proved feasible, and, being well managed, was profitable. As the use of stoves came to be so extensive, their production was an important industry; also hardware, in the line of culinary utensils and farming implements, were in increasing demand.

The discontinuance, gradually, of the old wooden and iron-clad plow, and the introduction of the cast-iron one, made ready market for a great quantity of foundry products, and gave employment to a large number of moulders and foundry-workers and much capital. This industry, conducted chiefly by the Cole family, has been an extensive and leading one at Lake village, and a substantial benefit to both the village and the town in general. The trade in, as well as the production of, this class of merchandise has been mainly at Lake village and in the hands of these men. Hence the place was called, for a long period, the Furnace village.

The iron-work done in the repair shops of the railroad located here has also increased the business of casting and added much to the bulk of foundry production, and the shops have given employment to a large force of workmen and given impulse and growth to the place.

This village, in population and business, has increased rapidly of late years, and is now the rival of Laconia, and by water approaches is even better connected. These two largest centres of business and population were begun at nearly the same time, but the lower one had decidedly the advantage for many years, particularly in having the court, the academy, the greater trade, the greater extent of manufactures, better connections in the old modes of travel by the stage lines, the bank, the taverns, the law-offices, the resident physicians, the churches and the central position in relation to the other towns already then settled. All these things contributed much to the prosperity and importance of the Lower village, and were almost entirely wanting in the Upper village.

From the working of cast-iron to that of wrought-iron the transition is natural and easy. The initial department of this work was that of the common blacksmith. The places and parties of this industry have been alluded to in the notices of the personnel of the first settlers and need now no minute tracing. The services of the blacksmith were a primary necessity and demand, as not only for horseshoeing and ox-shoeing and the ironing of vehicles and making of farming tools, but even the nails used by the carpenter were made of wrought-iron and produced at the common smith's forge in the early days of the settlement.

Some of the first artisans in this line were Antipas Gilman, in the south part of the town, and his two sons,—Winthrop and Josiah,—the latter of whom worked also afterwards at the village and subsequently became preacher to the Universalist Society there and finally settled in Lynn, Mass., following his profession there; and Henry Wadleigh, in Chattleborough; and Samuel Blaisdell, at his place in the northwest part of the town; succeeded by some four of his sons, particularly Philip O., who worked at the same place; and John, who wrought at the village and elsewhere and finally on Gunstock Hill; and Daniel, at the Lake-side road (the Captain Locke place) and afterwards at the Plains, his present residence; also James Follett, on Gunstock Hill; and at the village also William and Ebenezer Stevens, successively; and Josiah Gilman, already mentioned; and William H. Wadleigh, who wrought in several shops and for many years; and in later times Charles Beede, Benjamin Dame, Gilman Leavitt, Dudley Leavitt, with Charles Beede, Jacob Blaisdell, Charles Swain, a Mr. Cross and others temporarily. There have been six shops at the village, and the work done there has been of considerable variety as well as magnitude. John Blaisdell made hoes and edge-tools. His shop stood near the present site of the church and town hall. Beede (alone and with D. Leavitt) made axes and pitchforks and chains, and he built, on the new road, the present Wadleigh shop. Gilman Leavitt and Wadleigh, and, to some extent, others, ironed wagons, carriages and sleighs, and were tire-setters, and all did shoeing.

Smith-work was done at Lake village by Rabie and Hiram Gilman, and later, for carriages, by Rublee, who puts up the wood-work also. The same business, on a large scale, was done at Meredith Bridge by Thomas Babb, on the Gilford side. The most of the smith-work there was done on the Meredith side by Daniel Tucker and others.

The machinist business was carried on in connection with the factory and afterwards in separate buildings. Badger Taylor and Alva Tucker were early workmen at this trade. Later, a large building has been devoted to the business, located on the site of the old Ladd's mill.

The tanning and shoe-making and peg-making industries have been important. The old-style tannery and the bark-mill was quite common in different parts of the town. Benjamin Weeks, Esq., built one in 1792, and he did some business in the line and in connection with his son Matthias. Jeremiah Thing, nearly as early, pursued the business on Liberty Hill. Captain James Follett and also Richard Martin had yards on Gunstock Hill. The latter was run by John L. Martin afterwards and bought by Joseph & S. S. Gilman. These all have ceased to be operated.

Bernard Morrill carried on an extensive business at the village, which was enlarged and continued by I. I. Morrill and by I. I. & J. D. Morrill and by I. I. Morrill and Samuel Wright. About forty years ago the old yard was abandoned and a new mill was built, with steam works and water-power, for grinding bark. This has been in operation till within a short time for tanning, but the currying ceased some years ago. Another yard was many years in use at the village, run by Matthias Sewall and also Morrill Thing, but ceased to be used thirty years since. Matthias Sewall had a yard and business at the Plains before and after doing business at the village. James Crockett did a large tanning business at Meredith Bridge, near the Eager tavern and court-house. This was abandoned nearly fifty years ago. The main business in this line was done on the Meredith side by Worcester Boynton, on the site of the Buzzell mill and at Morrison's livery stable. A small amount of business was done in this line at other points in town.

The craft of the shoemaker was a special one from the first. William Clark was the itinerant shoemaker, going from house to house to do the yearly shoe and boot-making for the families in town.

Joseph Potter, Sr., was a permanently-located shoemaker at his homestead.

Samuel Gilman (1st), a deformed or crippled man, practiced cobblerly on Gunstock Hill. His son Jeremiah and grandson Daniel continued the business at the village (at B. Morrill's) and on Gunstock Hill, and the last-mentioned at three different locations in the village, and, finally, at the homestead, near the original place, on the hill. Paul Stevens pursued the trade first in the south part of the town and afterwards near the village. Israel Potter and, lately, his grandson, T. O. Potter, worked at the business at the old homestead and near by.

Leavit Sleeper very early was shoemaker at Gilford village. George W. Munsey early learned the business at Meredith Bridge, with one Mugget, and for many years pursued the business at the village. David Hale Munsey and Amos Prescott Munsey also carried on the business, in connection with George W., and the former also separately, and the work has not entirely ceased at the shop of David Hale Munsey. He has worked, or located his shop, at some four different points in the village. Thos. Perkins Ayer carried on the business at three different places in the village, and finally at the Plains. Daniel Gilman and T. P. Ayer worked also at harness-making. George Crosby, at Gunstock Hill, worked also at harness-making and shoemaking. Andrew Whittier pursued the trade in the east part of the village for many years; and Joseph Potter, son of Joseph Jr., was his apprentice. John Avery was apprentice of Daniel Gilman, and Jonathan Leavitt of Thos. P. Ayer. Warren Thompson worked at the business at the village, and at Laconia afterwards. Nathaniel Edwards and Jacob Clark were shoemakers at Meredith Bridge, and Daniel Dinsmore carried on the harness-making business, first on the Gilford side and afterwards on the Laconia side. Simon Rowe also for a time worked at the business at Gilford village, on sole-work. There has been no shoe manufactory on a large scale in Gilford, but the workmen at the business have been numerous. Some of these have also been dealers in leather, especially George W. and D. H. Munsey, Thos. P. Ayer and Daniel Gilman. The sole-leather trade was considerable. In later years ready-made shoes, for sale in shoe-stores, supply the greater part of the demand, so that, with a greater population and larger volume of business in the shoe line, the custom-workers are less. It was the almost universal custom for each man to buy a stock of leather and have it made into shoes and boots for the family on measure. The first settlers rarely had boots, but used the shoe and buskin, and some thought it a sinful extravagance to wear boots, especially of calf-skin.

The manufacture of shoe-pegs was begun on the north side of the river, on the canal, by Mr. S. K. Baldwin, and was brought to a pause by the great fire, which, originating in the peg-factory, destroyed the greater part of the business section of the place. This industry was resumed on the Gilford side in the place of the grist-mill, at Ladd's mill. It was carried on for a term of years, turning out about fifty bushels of pegs daily, many of which were exported to Europe after supplying the home market. After the destruction of these works the enterprise was started anew, with increased capacity, in buildings erected a short distance up-stream, and operated by power at the dam, communicated by continued shafting. The drying process is attended by considerable danger of conflagration. The timber used, principally white-birch and white-maple, was at last brought by railroad from the upper part of the State and Vermont. The business was attended with success by Mr. Baldwin & Sons.

The manufacture of hats and caps was undertaken by different parties at sundry times and divers places. A hat manufactory was started very early at Avery's, and Mr. Hibbard, on the Oaks road, was a hatter, and J. G. Weeks, at the village, conducted the business. G. W. & John G. Weeks, at the village, made also a stock of caps, of cloth and partly of fur. The industry of millinery was very limited in the days of home-made apparel. Miss Nancy and Fanny Stevens conducted a limited business in that line at the village, and some volume of business of the same was done at Meredith Bridge and Lake village. Likewise, dress-making was but limitedly conducted as an industry of itself, the average woman considering herself a master of the art, if the construction of their apparel in the simple style of former days could be said to involve anything of artifice at all. Yet to the higher class there were some ministering adepts to meet the imagined exigency; and these were represented slightly among other craftsmen, and their services were generously rewarded.

The tailor and tailoress were much more in demand, though the major part of men's apparel was made up by the clever maid of the house, or her training and instructive mother and sister. The craft was, however, represented from the beginning.

The primitive tailor was also an itinerant, and, with bodkin and goose and press-board, migrated through the neighborhood to uniform the lad and sire; the "hailed of all men" was the tailor. A clever dame by the name of Hannah Parsons, from Gilmanton, used to make her yearly tour a-tailoring, to the infinite delight of the ragged urchin and tattered swain. Joseph Sanborn, Sr., was also of this craft, and lived near Meeting-House Hill. Misses Ann and Sarah Munsey carried on this business some years at Gilford village; and later, Simon Goss and one McFarland; and in the east part of the town Joseph Roberts practiced the vocation. Mrs. Bartlet, on the Plains, and Messrs. Bugbee and Odlin, at the Furnace village, conducted the business. At Meredith Bridge the main business was done at first on the Meredith side by Francis Russell, and afterwards by Charles Russell and others. In later times, Nathaniel Stevens carried on the business in different shops.

The artisans on wood-work have not been few in Gilford, nor inapt. Chief of these has been the carpenter, including ship carpenter and framer. The average settler was a clever worker on wood, and he consequently rudely constructed many things himself, as out-buildings and many things needed in husbandry, and left for the carpenter the more difficult mechanisms, or the superintendence of non-journeymen workers. In the class of skilled journeymen workers were the following,—viz.: The Sanborns (Lowell, Richard, Lowell, Jr., Richard, Jr., Osgood, Benjamin, Lowell (Deacon) so-called) and others. They all, or nearly all, were practicing farming, or some other collateral vocation also at intervals. Then the Blaisdells (Samuel, the framer, Eliphlet and Hugh) and others. Then Joseph Thing, Sr. and Jr.; also John and Abel and Abel, Jr., Hunt. The Hunts were finishers in panel-work, banisters and ornamentations. In later years there were David Watson, Gardner Cook, Thomas M. Smith, F. Follet, P. Lovit, Jeremiah Hunt, A. Woodward and many others. Jonathan Watson and Thomas Ayers were broad-axemen, and had worked at ship-carpentry. Samuel Leavitt and a Mr. Bachelier were handy as millwrights. Thomas Plummer, Joshua Gilman, Enoch Osgood, Jonathan Whittier, Daniel Gove, Benjamin Rowe, Simeon Hoyt, Jr., John Abel, Jr., and Jeremiah Hunt and a few others were wheelwrights, as well as handy at carpentry.

Door, sash and blinds were formerly made by the common carpenter, but now at factories. The trade of carpentry has been an important one, as the work to be done has always been of considerable magnitude, the most of the buildings having been made of wood, and not a few of large dimensions and improved patterns.

Cabinet and furniture-making, as an industry, has been carried on at different places, as at Meredith Bridge by Ephraim Mallard, and on the Meredith side by the Somes Brothers; at Gilford village in the Whittier mill, by Jeremiah Hunt; at Abel Hunt's by himself and son, and by a few others at other places.

Coffins and caskets were formerly made by common carpenters.

Artisans on stone work have been of some note and carried on a limited business, both here and in some other places. Esquire Benjamin Wadleigh and Prescot Goss are still in active life as stone-cutters. Formerly there was quite a general inclination on the part of the young men of this town to enter upon the stone-cutting business. John & Freeman S. Gilman were engaged in the business extensively here and especially in Massachusetts. John M. Rowe in Frankfort, Me., where he quarried for Boston market great quantities of building-stone. William Levi, Dudley and Benjamin Folsom were also engaged in the business, and Joseph, son of Joseph Potter, Jr. Simeon Hoyt, Jr., also pursued the building of stone-work, and various other parties engaged in the coarser grades of stone-work and building, as stone-masons. There were here only a few formations of stone which were good for quarrying. The mountain deposits were of coarse and not compact substance, and the boulder masses were not usually fissile; yet some good monumental works have been made of them.

Workers of marble have been Jno. Merrill and Merrill, Hull & Co. This establishment has been a successful one, and has been lately located on the Meredith side, at Laconia, and employs several workmen.

The ordinary work of brick-masons has been limited, as but few brick buildings have been built in town. William and Henry Plummer, and Paul and Smith Stevens and some others did the masonry of former years, and in later times the work is dependent on artisans in the craft from other places.

The industry of brick-making was prosecuted in town a few years, particularly by Benjamin Rowe, on the Pine Hill stream, and this yard supplied the domestic market. But the notable Dol brick-yard, at the Weirs, on the Meredith side, was such in capacity, and by reason of the peculiar character of its clay, and in the quantity and quality of its products, that competition was impossible; hence, the few clay deposits in the town were not extensively used in brick-making.

The industry of pottery was carried on for many years, conducted by one Mr. Goodhue, at Gilford village. The clay was obtained from the Weirs, and was made into kiln-burnt brown earthen-ware. For milk-pans and crocks of various sizes and forms it was an excellent article, and was in general use till, in later years, the use of tin in the manufacture of wares for dairy uses, and stone for making jars and other vessels, superseded them, and caused this industry to be discontinued, and much to the satisfaction of the using public, as the earthenware was very fragile, as well as ponderous, and its glazing poisonous.

The manufacture of artificial limbs has been an industry pursued. The Palmer limb was invented at Meredith Bridge, and manufactured by him there (the iron-work by Charles Clement), at the corner of Main and Church Streets; but, subsequently, Woodman Jewett pursued the enterprise in Gilford, and then Samuel Jewett and others engaged in it, and finally the works were mostly removed to other places, as New York and Philadelphia.

Paper boxes have been manufactured by E. Beaman and another firm at Laconia. The demand for them has been great, and the industry employs many hands and considerable capital. The old-fashioned band-box, of a wooden veneer, has been superseded by the modern paste-board box of various forms and sizes, in which light manufactured goods are packed and sent to the market or the commission agent.

The trade of basket-making was pursued by Levi Lovit and Ichabod Buzzell at the east and west parts of the town respectively; also the sons of these, respectively, at the same places; and that of the former at Laconia in later years. Ezekiel Collins also pursued the business near Laconia, and Abel Hunt & Son at his place. These last also reseeded the ash chairs, and manufactured other articles. The industry of palm-leaf braiding was extensively pursued at one time. The work was done in the families, and conducted by the traders; those at Gilford village, Laconia and Lake village; particularly G. W. Weeks, Mesheek Sanborn, Horace Bugbee and a few others.

The enterprise and business of general trade has been important, and was early entered into, and is continued in increased amount and compass. Benjamin Weeks, Esq. began trade at his residence in the last century. His sons, Daniel and Elisha, were conducting the business there in the two first years of this century, the former succeeding the latter. The latter also did business later in Boston, which business was crippled in the time of the War of 1812, and he returned to Gilford and did more or less trading here in an informal way afterwards. His sons, John G. and George W., were long in trade at the village, and the latter, later, at Lake village. A store was stocked at Gunstock meeting-house by Stephen Pearly, of Meredith Bridge, and was run a few years by a clerk, and the same was closed and the building removed to the village. After this, Joseph Sanborn was in trade there for several years, and was succeeded by Jonas Sleeper, and he, in turn, by Benjamin Jewett, Jr., Esq. About this time Levi R. Weeks began trade there, but soon removed from town, as did also Elisha.

Charles Stark entered into trade at the Goodhue pottery, and in a few years was succeeded by Benjamin Weeks, Jr., and later by George W., and then by Weeks & Follet. These stores were well patronized and successfully conducted.

About the year 1840, the business being large, rivalry began, and a new firm was formed by Benjamin Jewett, formerly in the business, and Albert Chase, who had been clerk at the Stark store and also at Jewett's, and Jeremiah Thing. The firm of Jewett, Chase & Thing continued but a few years, became embarrassed, and was dissolved. The firm of Weeks & Follet was afterwards dissolved, and G. W. & Benjamin F. Weeks went into trade in the Jewett, Chase & Thing store. Richard Glidden was afterwards associated with G. W., and B. F. went out of trade. In later years George W. went into trade with his sons at Lake village. Levi B. Thompson returned from Brunswick, Me., and set up trade in a new store, and George W. & John Munsey traded at the Jewett store, and afterwards in the Thompson store. Mesheek Sanborn, a long-term postmaster, traded in a third store, and was succeeded by John Sleeper. Trade began to decrease under the facilities of transit to Meredith bridge, after the building of the Gully road, and the three stores were succeeded by two, and at length by one, and, in reduced volume of business, Martin Eaton continued the business for awhile, and at present the Jones store supplies the demands.

At Lake village the store on the west side was the only store at first; afterwards, Cole's store at the furnace, and the Bugbee store, at the bridge, were added; afterwards, G. W. Weeks and various other dealers opened places of trade, and the business is now of large capacity, and holds an enlarged place in the supply of the outlying districts, and in the patronage on the part of those who more and more make their marketing here.

The bakery business has been carried on at Lake village by Charles Elkins. The trade at Meredith bridge in early years was predominantly given to the Meredith side, and to this day the bulk of trade is there.

The French store, however, has done a fair share of business since its opening, which was at an early date, and has not frequently changed ownership. Henry French conducted it for many years, and was principal member of later partnerships. Avery's store was the first opened, in 1790, at the end of the bridge. Various other business concerns were located in two small buildings on each side of the roadway, at the abutment of the bridge. The one on the up-river side of the roadway was built by L. B. Walker, Esq., and extended beyond the natural shore-line into the river, and its supposed obstruction to the water-flow created a sensation on the part of those interested in the water-power above, and demands were made for its withdrawal, on penalty of its being overturned into the river.

Richard Gove conducted, for nearly a half-century, the jewelry business in this and other buildings. The post-office, established in 1824, was once kept in the building on the down-river side of the way by Mr. A. C. Wright, who conducted the paper, the Winnipisaukee Gazette, and did business as shoe-dealer, and afterwards in Lowell, Mass., whence he came, and whither he returned. The large block on the corner has been occupied by various parties for offices, residences and trading-places, and on its site, since its destruction, have been located various structures, among which is a market, a shoe-shop and drug-store. Swain's store has been recently added, and one opposite the hosiery was in occupancy by I. Tilton for some years.

Hotel-keeping, a branch of trade, has been of some importance and has been conducted by a few enterprising men as landlords.

The Lawrence tavern, on Gilford side, was rival of the Robinson's tavern, on the other side. It was kept by Ebenezer Lawrence, and afterwards by John Tilton, and then became the Willard Hotel, and was considered "beautiful for situation," and a favorite resort to the best class of the traveling public and for boarders. It was afterwards kept by Young, Morrison & Everet. The Eager tavern was nearer the courthouse, but "the court" usually made his abode at the Willard, and the litigant more generally at the Eager and Robinson's. The Eager has often changed landlords and name. It has been kept by Asa Eager, Frank Chapman, Charles Beede, Hiram Verrill, Mr. Tu-k, A. Morrison, John Blaisdell and others, at different times, and known as the Belknap House and by other names, and been enlarged and rebuilt. The building of another house at Winnesquam, "The Bay View," and now still another, "Vue De L'Van," has been in response to summer travel and required boarding, which has greatly increased; and other houses for boarding, such as the Maplewood, etc., have been opened.

At Lake village, Sargent's tavern was opened some thirty years ago, and before that there was no public-house and not much travel to require one. The travel by stage was mainly through Meredith. As to travel, its mode, direction and extent, great changes have occurred. The stage-lines were from Conway and the upper parts of the State to Concord and Boston. Daily trips were made each way. One day took passengers from the upper towns to Concord, and the next day to Lowell and Boston. These stages were usually filled. Daniel Greene drove a mail line from Meredith Bridge, through Gilmanston, to Pittsfield, and a bi-weekly stage ran to Alton Bay. This last route underwent some alterations,—at one time passing through Gilford village, and, at another, via Intervale to Lake village, and was finally discontinued and a special route made to the village; and West Alton was connected with Alton Bay.

Robert Carr kept a semi-hotel, or entertained teamsters and travelers, as a halting-place between Emerson's, at West Alton, and Meredith Bridge. Captain James Follet furnished meals and entertained at town-meetings and on other public occasions at the Meeting-House Hill. These, with many other places recently, furnishing board in the summer season, constituted the hotel provisions in the town and vicinity.

About 1845 travel by rail began. The Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad was first opened to Meredith Bridge, and afterwards to Plymouth, and finally to Wells River.

The repair-shops were located at Lake village, and a wharf and landing at the Weirs.

Before this, in 1832, the first steamboat, the "Belknap," was built at Lake village, and got up into the lake by being buoyed up, to pass the shallows at the Weirs. She was a heavy, clumsy boat, and ran only a few years till she ran aground near Long Island, and was finally broken up and disposed of. Captain Winborn Sanborn was the commander of her, and he was, in after-years, also of the "Lady of the Lake." Since that time the "Lady of the Lake," the "White Mountain," the "Long Island," the "Winnepesaukee," the "Minneola," the "James Bell" and many other smaller steamers have been put upon routes on the lake, and communicate with the Weirs and Lake village. Much transportation has been made also by the horse-power toll-boats, and in gondolas (so-called popularly), and by rafts and smaller boats.

The corporations located in the town, or doing business therein, have been the Iron-Mining and Foundry Company, the Ticking-Mill Company, the steamboat companies, the Academy Corporation, the Horse Railroad Company (formed in 1883, and running street cars from Laeonia and Lake village), the Savings-Bank, National Bank and some smaller concerns that do business on joint capital and have common interests.

In educational work and facilities, the town has a commendable record in the past, and standing at present.

When the town was incorporated there had been formed ten districts in which schools had been maintained, and the money raised that year for the support of these schools was four hundred and ninety-two dollars. These districts have since been increased till they numbered fourteen. The added districts were the Lake village (the village having grown up since that time), the Zebecoe Morrill District, the Daniel Brown District and the Captain Marsten District. These schools were maintained by the school-money, divided according to the valuation of the district, as bounded. Hence, they varied in duration, and often were of short duration. Usually, a summer and a winter term was held, of eight or twelve weeks each. Select schools were occasionally held at Gilford village and at Lake village in more recent years, and, in 1820, an academy was established at Meredith Bridge, which was sustained some forty years, and then consolidated with the High School or graded schools of that village. This was a rival school of the Gilmanston Academy, which was established there in 1794.

The academy had not, alas! the prestige of that of Gilmanton, a generous grant of land from the State and the appropriation of its school-plot from the town. But it had the moral support of the better class of the community, and a liberal patronage. It was well instructed and managed under Preceptor Joshua M. Pitman, from Meredith, and Dyer H. Sanborn, from Gilmanton, and John C. Clark, Mr. Emerson and others, whose preceptorships were the good fortune of the corporation and the praise of the patrons and students. There had been a short interim in the principalship when Benjamin Stanton, from Lebanon, Me., and a graduate of Bowdoin College, assumed the duties of principal, and Clara Stanton those of assistant and preceptress, which was in 1849, and continued till 1853.

The school was sustained a few years afterwards and was taught by several teachers, among whom were Woodbury L. Melcher, A.M., Mr. Richer, Professor Hammond, Professor Burleigh and, after consolidation, by J. G. Jewett and others, and was at length consolidated with the graded public schools, and its record becomes merged in that of the town schools. At different times select schools were held for a single term at Gilford village. Such were taught by Albert G. Weeks and Nathan Weeks, William H. Farrar, C. C. Watson, D. S. Frost, Dr. Dearborn and others. The old-time teachers were severe disciplinarians, and the scholars of that day stalwart and rude. The female teachers of the summer school were somewhat noted for their matronly kindness and care and advanced age. Two by the name of Mary Sanborn followed the vocation till in far advanced years.

Among the male teachers who exclusively taught the winter schools were William H. Farrar, Albert G. Weeks, Ira G. Folsom, Rev. Mr. Damon, Daniel K. Smith, Rev. D. C. Frost and others, who were men of ability and extended education, and some were collegians. Of another class, athletic and disciplinarians, were Jeremiah Thing, James Morrison, John Davis, J. J. Morrill, Daniel Eaton, George Hoyt, Samuel Evans, Jonathan Weeks, Harrison Bennet, William B. Weeks, Benjamin Sanborn, David Y. Smith, Aaron Blaisdell, Daniel Blaisdell, John M. Rowe, Nathan Weeks, William Morrill, Harrison Sanborn, Rufus Morrill, S. S. Ayer, William Hunt, George Sanders, George Sleeper, Nehemiah Sleeper, Simon Rowe, Shepherd Rowe, Rev. J. L. Sinclair, M. B. Smith and many others. Nehemiah Sleeper was school committee for the town at its commencement, and Esquire Benjamin Weeks was a leading man in educational interests even before the incorporation of the town. A few sons of Gilford have graduated at college,—William, son of Esquire Benjamin Weeks, Albert G. Weeks, Ira Folsom, J. P. Watson, Woodbury L. Melcher, C. C. Watson, John B. Morrill, A. J. Thompson, Jonas Sleeper, Daniel Dinsmore, Joseph B. Clark and a few others.

The town early contained circulating libraries, which did much for the instruction and general intelligence of the community; these were well read, but have not been maintained. A public library is provided by Laconia for that part of Gilford now detached.

There have been two newspapers published in town,—one more recently at Lake village and one formerly at Meredith Bridge,—but papers published in Boston and New York have larger circulation.

The Gazette (Winnipesaukee), at Meredith Bridge, was edited and published sometimes in Gilford and sometimes in Meredith, and under changed names. Among its editors and managers have been Charles Lane, J. C. Moulton, A. C. Wright, Mr. — Baldwin (of unhappy and premature death), and several others. Mr. Drake was some years foreman printer. The Laconia Democrat may be considered the successor of the Gazette, and has been well conducted, but belongs to Laconia properly. The Lake Village Times is under the management of the Hon. Mr. Haynes, member of Congress, and is a successful issue and patronized by readers of the town of the Republican party and sympathies. Gilford has not been distinguished for authors and authorship, unless we except the work done in the line of text-books by Dyer H. Sanborn, and the ordinary editorials in the regular issues of newspapers.

In professional ranks and services there have been adepts and honorable success. The medical practitioners have been many, and by no means in dishonor. They have been generally trustworthy and efficient, and, in some instances, distinguished. In the first years after the settlement of this part of the Gilmanton territory the demand for medical and surgical services was met by the abundant supply of doctors resident in Old Gilmanton. Many of them had a wide practice, even spanning Gilford, and extending across the lake into towns adjacent to the northern shore. Such men were Dr. William Smith, in 1768 and to 1830; Jonathan Hill, 1778 and onward into the present century; Obadiah Parish, 1790-94; Abraham Silver, 1790-1801; Simon Foster, 1793-1824; Daniel Jacobs, 1796-1815; Benjamin Kelley, 1801-39; Asa Crosby, 1816-32; Thomas H. Merrill, 1814-22; William Prescott, 1815-33; Dixie Crosby, 1824-38, and at Gilford, 1835-38; Otis French, 1828 and onward; Jacob Williams, 1816-28; Nathan C. Tebbetts, 1825 and onward; John C. Page, who practiced at Gilford village in 1826 and Gilmanton, 1832-36, and was afterward a minister; Nabum Wight, 1832 and onward many years; Joseph Gould, 1820 and onward; Edward G. Morrill, 1834 and afterward; and some others for a short time.

Those who have located and practiced in this town, more exclusively, were Zadock Bowman, at Meredith Bridge, in early times; J. C. Prescott; Dixie Crosby, about 1835, and who became distinguished as surgeon and professor in Dartmouth Medical College; Josiah Crosby, succeeding Dixie; Andrew McFarland, 1838 and onward; J. L. Peasley, who soon retired from practice; Dr. Garland, about 1845-60; Dr. Ayer, 1850 and onward; Dr. Francis Sleeper, native-born, and practicing till about 1860; Warren Sleeper and Warren Leach, homeopaths, or of the Botanic School; Dr. Knowles, a few years, about 1845; Dr. Prescott, succeeding Knowles; Dr. Wilson, about 1875, and again at present; Dr. Weeks, homeopathist; Dr. Foster, to the present time; Dr. B. Munsey, eclectic to the present time at Gilford village and also Laconia; Dr. Josiah Sawyer, at the village for many years prior to 1845; Dr. George W. Munsey, at the village for some forty years prior to 1856; Dr. Charles Tebbets, at the village and later at Laconia; Dr. Dearbon, at the village a short time; Dr. Devan, at the village and Lake village; Dr. Moore and Dr. Goss, homeopathists at Lake village; Dr. Frank Russell and Dr. I. S. French, native-born, and graduating as residents; Drs. Frank Stevens and Hosea Smith and others studied medicine with Drs. Garland and Ayer, and practiced elsewhere. There was also in early times a class who practiced limitedly without professional education, as Mrs. Samuel Blaisdell and Mrs. Frohock, and others; also, Nathaniel Davis, Sr., D. Y. Smith and I. S. Gilman, by patent preparation. Mrs. A. F. Wiley is sole representative of female practice, under a regular diploma, and after a full course of medical education. Her location was first at Gilford village, and afterwards at Laconia.

The spotted fever epidemic was in 1816, and Dr. Asa Crosby discovered an effectual remedy for it; other fevers, notably the typhoid, has been at times epidemic, but this array and force of medical ability has proved a defiance to their ravages, and protected life effectually.

A special instance of surgical operation was the case of Malachi Davis, who was opened and had gravel extracted, and lived many years afterwards. The surgery of Dr. Ayer was skillful, as was also that of the Crosbys.

The legal profession, though not represented by so numerous a host as the medical, was nevertheless not without distinguished men. The shiretown of Strafford County, and later of Belknap, would naturally collect into its domain much legal talent and furnish much practice.

The first court-house and courts were at East Gilmanton, where there is now no village. In 1799 the courts began to be held at the Academy village, and the legal men were collected and resident there. Later still, the courts and court-house were located in what was thereafter Gilford. The several lawyers of Gilmanton and from other places came here to transact business in the court, and at length the legal talent was massed at this point. Timothy Call was here as early as, or before, 1801, and ten years later Lyman B. Walker, and Stephen C. Lyford in 1815, and Benjamin Boardman ten years later. Gilmanton was thirty-two years without a lawyer, when, in 1793, Stephen Moody, pioneer of the profession in this part of the county, appeared in that capacity among the inhabitants of the Lower Parish. The more important matters in question had been managed by lawyers of Exeter and other places of older settlement, and Joseph Badger, as magistrate, with the justices in their official administration before him, disposed of the matters of minor moment. In the immediately subsequent years the law business of the early settlers of Gilford was done by the lawyers of Gilmanton proper, where there were practicing, besides Stephen Moody, John Ham, after 1801; Nathaniel Cogswell, after 1805; Benjamin Emerson, after 1822; Nathan Crosby, after 1824; James Bell, about 1825 (who afterwards pursued his profession in Gilford); George Minot, in 1831; Arthur Livermore, in 1833; Ira A. Eastman, in 1834; E. St. L. Livermore, in 1835; William Butterfield, in 1841; George G. Fogg, in 1844; and others later. The courts of Strafford County being held at two places, Dover and Gilford, the share of litigation in the county was less for the term sitting at Gilford than that for the term sitting at Dover; yet some very important cases were tried at Gilford, and "court time," especially "great day,"—i.e. the day for criminal cases, viz.: the first Thursday—was a season of great concourse and a gala-day for venders and jockeys and horse-racing, and all manner of excitement and excesses, personal and social. The effect of the time was both to partially clear and to replenish the docket, and both to empty and to fill the pockets, as depended.

Many lawyers of Dover and Portsmouth, of Exeter and Concord and other places, were accustomed to practice at the Strafford, (later, the Belknap) bar; and many a powerful plea and weighty charge and able opinion or decisive verdict was made and heard and given and rendered in the court-house at this place. The mighty men, Pearce and Hale, Atherton and Bellows, Batters and Bell, argued causes masterly here. Later and not much lesser advocates before this bar were Whipple and Stevens, Hibbard and Lovell, Hutchinson and Melcher, Vaughan and Clark (both Joseph B. and Samuel), Jewel and Jewett, and others who follow in the train of Walker and Boardman, and Lyford and Hazeltine.

The common justices of the town, who did much of the minor law business of the town, were headed by Esq. Benjamin Weeks, who, as mediator between man and man, heard and advised in those interminable questions of disputed rights of possession, arising from the imperfectly-defined boundaries to plants in the wilderness; as also in matters of dues, not considered consistent with ability or determination; and in matters of demeanor, private and public; and this, no narrow sphere for the good esquire.

Among those thus honorably constituted and acting were the following: Benjamin Jewett, Jr., Bernard Morrill, E. S. Hunt, Meshech Sanborn, Josiah Sawyer and Daniel Weeks, for the centre of the town; Joseph P. Smith, Daniel Brown and Daniel Eaton, for the east part of the town; John Evans, Samuel Leavitt, Ebenezer and John Smith, for the north; Charles Hibbard, Joseph Libbey, Aaron C. Blaisdell, G. Thing, George Saunders, Samuel G. Sanborn and Aaron Robinson, for the northwest; Benjamin Sanborn, Joseph Sleeper, Benjamin Cole, John Blaisdell, V. Barron, for the west part of the town; and Morrill Thing, J. James, Ephraim Mallard, Ebenezer Lawrence, Woodbury Melcher, and many others, in the south part of the town and Meredith Bridge.

The Probate Court was held at Gilford, and after the division of the county Warren Lovell was many years the judge and Esquire Vaughn the clerk. The successors will be learned from reference to another chapter, treating of the courts, the bench and the bar.

The Sheriffs of the county have been Asa Eager, — Philbrick, Bartlett Hill and others, as will also be seen from the section appropriated to the bench and the bar. The deputies have been these, some before promotion, and as not promoted, Dudley, Smith and others, as will also be seen from reference to the same article. There have been important causes tried at this bar of the Court of Common Pleas, — e. g., the case of Hain vs. the town of Alton, to recover damages by reason of imperfect or obstructed highways; twice tried without agreement and verdict by the jury, and transferred. The cases of land-holders vs. the Locks and Canal Company, to recover damages for unanatural flowages. The company, by Hon. James Bell, Esq., their agent, assisted by Hon. Charles G. Atherton and others, defended themselves vs. many land-holders and mill-owners on the Winnesquam and other bays, who brought suits for damages to lands and mill privileges. The company lost their case, and appealed, and afterwards compromised. The company, to secure greater capacity of reservoir in the lake and bays, instituted a critical survey of the lake and its surroundings by a skilled civil engineer, Daniel K. Smith, assisted by others, and caused an accurate computation to be made of the whole basin's increase in capacity, by a definite increase of height by flowage (above the natural level); also the amount capable of being drawn by reducing the natural level to a definite extent. The result of the litigation in cases on the Winnesquam, and the unexpected amount of damages that would result from raising the surface of the lake, led to the decision to attempt only a slight increase of flowage, and an extra draught by means of a canal, cut in the bed of the river at Aquaducton, which decision was carried into effect, and whatever damages were occasioned, either by draught or flowage, were paid, by agreement with the parties sustaining them. The surveying of Smith & Crocker, of Laconia, was notable and of fine specimen. The desire of the company to add height to the dam at the foot of Winnesquam, and at Lake Village and Meredith Bridge, and thereby to increase the reservoir capacity of the lakes and bays, was accomplished in a measure, but by purchase, and not by court decisions.

The litigation of citizens with one another, or the town with individuals, or either with corporations, has not been to a great extent, and the courts have been generally good arbiters of justice. Pauper cases and disputed possession, and building of roads and bridges, have constituted the greater part of legal actions and contentions. Cases of prosecutions for liquor-selling without license were at one time quite numerous. Criminal cases have been few, and the courts and the legal profession, in such cases, have honorably dealt with the arraigned, according to the law and the testimony.

The Ecclesiastical History of Gilford is of importance and interesting. It will embrace the relation and development of several denominations; the annals of the several particular churches organized in the town; and the biographical sketches of the ministers raised up and laboring here, with notices of the leading men in these churches and of special issues taken and decided. The aims and the provisions of the proprietors of Gilmanton and, more primarily, of the colonial authorities, were religious rather than ecclesiastical. They did not foresee or anticipate a heterogeneous moral community, and yet the primal stock and idea was narrow and exclusive, and, to their surprise, was found to be thus developing itself. Their religious sentiments manifested a dogmatic nature and tendency. At the first a man was placed in service by comparatively disinterested authorities, the district proprietors, who labored more for the moral improvement of the people than for the special ecclesiastical outlook, or even the spiritual culture.

He, the Rev. William Parsons, was a man of moral rectitude and devotion, and of great catholicity of sentiment and fellowship. He was sent by the proprietors to fulfill their stipulated engagement as a religious instructor for the first ten years of the settlement. This he fulfilled with punctilious exactness and faithfulness. But the germs of two faiths and typical life were in this nascent body politic; and when the throes were past it was found that twins were brought forth, and they, like the typical pair, had been taking each other by the heel in ante-natal strife.

The people, when they came to exercise their choice in regard to a settled minister, found a portion of them united on Rev. Isaac Smith. Without disrespect or averting any regard for Mr. Parsons, who was then nearly sixty years of age and in many ways still useful, the people attempted to provide for the future spiritual guide to the rapidly-expanding settlement. In 1773, when this point in religious affairs had been reached, the thoughts of many prospectors had been directed to the outlook of the place at the terminus of the Province road, which had now been built three years, and the inevitable enlargement in that quarter expected was taken into account when they were devising ways and means for having a settled ministry. Yet, evidently, some foresaw two parishes in their laying out and defining the First Parish, but doubtless did not forecast two faiths. In deciding the question of the location of the first church, as well as in the selection of the minister, there was developed a decided opposition; and this opposition was found to be not altogether as to the question of convenience and accommodation, but involved matters of belief and special interest. Hence, in 1774, about the time Stephen Gale was locating and building his mills at Meredith Bridge, the people were building their churches in the Lower Parish. The Baptist element proved to be strong and persistent. They felt able to rival the Congregationalists, and succeeded in raising their church building the same day that the other party did theirs. Their church was existing, as the first in the State, on November 16, 1773. The Congregationalists' interests and affairs were managed townwise. Hence, no action churchwise antedates the Baptist records. Mr. Smith preached preliminary to a stated engagement in the fall of 1773 and regularly after May 18, 1774, and was inducted into the pastorate November 30th of the same year, at which date the history of the church, as an organization, may be considered to begin, prior doings being not organic action.

The Baptist Church, though already organized, with moderator, clerk and deacon, was without a regular minister installed. Ministers of that order from other places supplied them occasionally and administered baptism. Deacon Thomas Edgerly and Samuel Weeks, as clerk, officiated in public service in the interval and a few years later, in 1777, Samuel Weeks and Edward Locke were licensed to preach in the church, and go forth on all the field as preachers of the gospel and hold meetings anywhere. These going forth accordingly, and Mr. Smith as well, visited places beyond the First Parish lines, in what was beginning to be called the Upper Parish, including what was afterwards called the Gunstock Parish, and also what was in later years denominated the Upper Parish of Gilmanton, the former being now Gilford and the latter Belmont. The sowing of this seed of dissent and independency yielded its first harvest in 1779 and 1789, when it was seen to be a game at which more than one could play. Edward Locke, the licensed preacher, had become tinctured with Arminian sentiments, and dissented from the articles of faith adopted by that church three years previous. Samuel Weeks was then ordained, but soon took the same course and left the church and town, leaving thus the church un-supplied.

Four years later Dudley Young was appointed to officiate in public services; and soon after this Elder Powers was called, who was constituted pastor of the church by ordination and installation, which took place on the 14th of June, 1776. The town took action, in which the words "Upper Parish" are used, as early as 1777. In 1780 the two ministerial lots were designated as No. 13 in the seventh range and No. 10 in the thirteenth range. These were situated outside of the First Parish, the latter in Gunstock Parish, and which was afterwards known as the ministerial lot appropriated to the benefit of that parish in particular; and the former in the Tioga Parish, or Upper Parish, Gilmanton, and hence, presumably, designated for the special benefit of that parish. Thus there was at this early date a recognition of the prospect of three parishes. There were issues made on the taxation of all citizens to support the Congregational, or the town's, meeting-house service, and the decision was that they should be exempt who should file a certificate from the wardens of the Baptist Church that they had paid to the support of preaching at their church. But in regard to the inhabitants of the Upper Parish, it was voted by the town in 1787, that they be taxed to either the Congregational or the Baptist support, and that the money so levied be appropriated to supply preaching in that part of the town, and given to the two regular ministers, Powers and Smith, who should render service there, each according to the amount so raised and designated. The place of holding their services was left to the judgment and choice of the adherents, or their preachers, respectively, as there were no churches yet built in the Upper Parish, or parishes more properly. The same action was taken in 1788 also, and thus it appears that Mr. Smith and Mr. Powers were the first authorized preachers in this part of the town, or in Gilford. The people now began to provide for the building of another church to accommodate that part of the town. The same rivalry and contention on the question of location, or of division, took place here as had been encountered in the Lower Parish, and the result was the same, viz.: two houses built the same year, 1792. One was located on the Province road, two or three miles south of Meredith Bridge, and the other on Gunstock Hill, now in Gilford; and these were some four or five miles apart. These became centres of two distinct parishes, Gunstock and Upper Gilmanton. The Congregationalist interests more largely centred in this lower, or now middle house, and the Baptist influence predominated in the upper, or Gunstock house, and in that vicinity; though that house, being built by the people in common participation, was open to each society, or to preachers of any denomination who might be invited by any considerable party of citizens, and to these each for a time in proportion to the number of citizens inclining and allying themselves to each such order or preacher.

In 1792, before the completion of these houses, the town voted to tax the Congregationalist Society in the Upper Parish the same as in the Lower Parish, and that the society (implying that one had been already formed) in the Upper Parish may lay out their money as they see fit. In 1794, after the houses were built, the town granted leave to Mr. Smith to preach in the Upper Parish, if an agreement could be made between him and the people there. They evidently were supporting a separate interest, and yet not united nor strong enough to support entirely a separate minister, and much less one for each of the two or more parties. It is understood that Mr. Smith's preaching in the Upper Parish was mainly at the Province road house, and that on that service the Congregationalists resident in the Gunstock region generally attended.

The Baptists, who had established themselves in Meredith in 1782, controlled affairs largely in the north part of the town, and had the principal occupancy of the Gunstock meeting-house for several years. The defection of Weeks and Locke had checked their fervor, and put the Baptist cause into a serious disadvantage. Nor were they alone in the departure. John Shepard, Esq., afterward most popular and prominent in public civil affairs, who had been a member of that church almost from its beginning, was in sympathy with Locke and in connection with him, and Elder Tozer Lord, of Barrington, laid the foundation of an extensive and organized secession from the Baptist order and denomination, and the founding of the order of Free-Will Baptists, which was an anti-Calvinistic movement and successful in many parts. He professed afterwards to have received these views by a special Divine unfolding or revelation before they were known to Locke and Lord, and that he communicated the same to them, and with them founded the order.

These three men, voluntarily shutting themselves up in the untenanted house of Esquire Piper, on Clough's Hill, over the Gilmanton border, in London, fasted and prayed for a week, as they said, and then wrote out their articles of faith, mutually ordained themselves, Locke and Lord as preaching elders and Shepard as ruling elder, and went forth as a new church. The genius of the new order was zealous propagandism, and the immediate action was to go, the 1st of April, 1780, to New Durham, and ordain one Benjamin Randall, who became the apostle and reputed originator of the new faith. This doctrinal faith thenceforward was advocated in various places; and when the Baptists sought a man to occupy the Gunstock field, and had united on Richard Martin, of Lee, who had been ordained in 1795 and came to labor here the following year, they found that he held like views.

The project to form a Second Baptist Church at the Gunstock meeting-house, by a council called October 12, 1797, was therefore abandoned, and the next year a Free-Will Baptist Church was organized there, and Richard Martin became its pastor and continued such a little more than a quarter of a century, and until his death, by apoplexy, October 17, 1824.

The Baptist cause was thus checked, or superseded, and but little effort was made to sustain meetings regularly in Gunstock Parish until 1811. At this time the Second Baptist Church was formed by a territorial division of the First Church, and Elder Uriah Morrison was placed in care of it, and it was convened part of the time at the church and the greatest part of the time at other places, till 1817, when Mr. Morrison died. He was succeeded by Elder Stroug, who preached at the school-house and at various other places.

Soon after this the Baptists built a house of worship at Lake village and concentrated their interests and held their meetings there. A large and flourishing church has been gathered there under the labors of Elders A. M. Swain, L. Chase, H. D. Hodge, Mr. Huntley, J. M. Coburn, A. Brown, W. A. Horn, King Solomon Hall (who has been twice in the pastorate and once State commissioner of education) and several others, as J. E. Damon, J. M. Chick and A. R. Wilson. Kelley Rowe improved his gift as lay preacher with this church and elsewhere. Deacon Eliphlet Blaisdell has been a life-long, active and devoted member.

The church building has been rebuilt and enlarged and rededicated in 1871, and is an elegant and spacious edifice.

For a few years after the death of Richard Martin his church continued to occupy the Gunstock meeting-house the major part of the time and was ministered to by various ministers from abroad, one of whom was John Rollins. The other denominations claimed its use their share of the time, and there was no little contention for its occupancy and complaint for too frequent occupancy by others. The Baptists, too, complained of exclusion. The Universalists demanded it a part of the time; William Blaisdell occupied it part of the time in the interest of the Christians, or Christian Baptists, whose tenets and faith he indorsed and advocated at that time. The Congregationalists claimed its use a fourth part of the time. Under the force of these existing circumstances and conditions, and these discordant and jealous sentiments, the several parties successively relinquished their claims, and, for peace and prosperity's sake, located themselves in different quarters; and so the old church was abandoned. And for several years it served only for a place to hold the town-meetings, till the building of the new town hall, about 1840.

It was finally sold to Captain Benjamin Weeks and others, and taken down. It was a stately edifice, two stories in height, steepleless, with two porches for entries to the end-doors and for stairways to the galleries; a broad door in front, leading to the broad aisle; galleries on three sides, the east, west and south; a sounding-board suspended over the high and narrow pulpit, and the singers' seats opposite, in the left; square (and a few oblong) pews, above and below, built in panel-work, with rail and banisters; and double rows of small and thickly-set windows, thus making a grand appearance, and commanding admiration in the beholder, and wonder and pride to the townsman. Its timbers were massive and frame strong, and should have endured ages, and yet it stood scarcely fifty years. It sat on the very summit of a hill, about six hundred feet above the lake-level, and commanding one of the finest prospects and scenery of New England, and itself a conspicuous landmark and object of veneration and beauty in all this region; but its glory was despoiled by discord and strife, alienation and division; its beauty had departed. Soon after the close of Elder Martin's pastorate, or bishopric (for he was not confined to labor in this church, but superintended, or oversaw, churches or enterprises in Gilmanton Upper and Lower Parishes, and Sanbornton and elsewhere), the church was reconstructed, and they built a house at the village. This had a large congregation in attendance, coming from all parts of the town. The church has been ministered to by Elders John L. Sinclair, Abel Glidden, John D. Knowles, John Knowles, Elbridge Knowles, John Pinkham, Ezekiel True, Maxy Burlingame, D. C. Frost, Seth Perkins, G. Sanborn, G. A. Park, I. C. Kimball, J. W. Rich, F. E. Wiley, Mr. Emery, Mr. Hyatt and some others. It was reorganized about 1855.

The Second Free-Will Baptist Church was organized November 6, 1816, in the southern part of the town and northern part of Gilmanton. It was not to be considered as distinctively a church of the Upper Parish of Gilmanton, though it used the Province road meeting-house most of the time. The church at Fellows' Mills, under Peter Clark, was the regular church of this order in Upper Gilmanton, and this church, whose members mostly lived in Gilford, was considered, as appropriately classed, a church of Gilford, and it was under the care of Elder John Knowles, Sr., while sometimes supplied and superintended by Elder Martin. It had about fifty members, and continued till the death of Elder Knowles, in 1837. After that time the major part of the members joined the First Church, at Gilford village, and a new church was organized at the Province road house, and became distinctively a church of Upper Gilmanton, and is not, in a proper sense, the successor of the Second Church, though some of its members are residents of Gilford, and a large part of the Second Church was incorporated into it. Elbridge Knowles, son of John, Sr., was its pastor, and it has had a continued line of succession since then.

A Third Free-Will Baptist Church was gathered at Lake village in 1838. Meetings were at first held some four years, in a room in the upper story of the woolen-mill, by I. L. Sinclair and others. Subsequently a chapel was built on the main street, north of the Baptist Church, in 1842, and Elder Waldron (T. N. H.), Nahum Brooks, John Pottingale, William Johnson and Uriah Chase supplied the congregation.

At length a commodious house was built on the Commons Hill, in 1852, and has been occupied since, by I. L. Sinclair and Elders H. S. Kimbal, Smith Lairfield, Kinsman R. Davis, Ezekiel True, I. N. Knowles, S. D. Church, Hosea Qumby, C. B. Peckham and others have supplied it; also, M. C. Henderson, I. W. Scribner, C. E. Cate, E. W. Ricker, E. W. Porter and a few others more temporarily.

A Fourth Free-Will Baptist Church was gathered at Meredith Bridge, which worshiped awhile in the court-house, and afterwards built a commodious house, which has been rebuilt, then burnt and rebuilt again. The church has prospered, and the congregation has been one of the largest of the place. It has had for its supply Revs. Nahum Brooks, I. D. Stewart, Ebenezer Fisk, A. D. Smith, Elders F. Lyford, F. Locke, Lewis Malvern, Granville Waterman, F. George and others. Its sanctuary is elegant and spacious.

The Universalists built a church at Gilford village at the time of abandoning the old Gunstock house, and held services in it a few years, with intervals of discontinuance. Josiah Gilman and Robert Bartlett supplied the society some years, and lived on Liberty Hill, the latter on the Osgood estate and the former at his father's, Antipas Gilman, and, later, at the village. William Blaisdell preached for the Christians. Other preachers occupied the pulpit at times, and, in later years, the Second Methodist Church have used the building and held service regularly.

The Universalist society that was gathered at Meredith Bridge built a house and held services there many years, but subsequently sold the house to the Methodist society, who now occupy it. The Universalist society was supplied by Elders Atchinson, Prince and others. The society was not large, but was prosperous for a number of years, and then was given up, and has now no open existence.

The people of Unitarian sentiments, not being numerous and wealthy enough to maintain a separate church and services, and being well pleased with the Rev. Dr. Young and his preaching, united in the congregation worshipping in the North Church, and only in later years have had a church and supply. Their church was located on the Laconia side, but some of the principal adherents lived in Gilford.

The Congregationalists, who at first held services in the Gunstock and Province road meeting-houses, having but limited privileges in those houses, by reason of the claimed rights of other sects, began to centre their interests at Meredith Bridge, and built a church in the south part of the village, which was about midway between the Gunstock and Province road meeting-houses. Here a church was organized in 1824, the year in which Elder Martin died, and the current began to run in favor of relinquishing claims to, and occupancy of, the old church. They enjoyed the services of Mr. Jotham Sewell Norwood for five years, and in 1832 settled Rev. J. K. Young.

Soon after the beginning of his pastorate the church, together with the dwelling-house of Esquire L. B. Walker, was burnt. It stood south of the Lawrence tavern (since the Tilton and the Willard). The society decided to rebuild on the Meredith side, and thenceforward the church is no longer called a church of Gilford, though a large part of its communicants and attendants have belonged to this town; and they are the only representatives of the orthodox faith in the town, and are citizens of good standing and of financial ability. Some of that religious belief mingled in the Free-Will Baptist congregations at Gilford village and Lake village, as a matter of convenience, there being no Congregational Church near in either direction. This church has had prosperity, and enjoyed distinction among other churches, under the long pastorate and able services of Dr. Young and his successors, the Revs. Stone, Bacon, Fullerton and Thurston; and it supplies an important place in the religious interests and moral power of Gilford society.

The two Methodist Churches, already alluded to, one located at Gilford village, and the other at Laconia village, are of recent origin, and yet hold some prominence in the religious elements and forces of society. They are neither of them strong, but jealous of their interests and zealous in their work. Their growth has not been rapid, nor yet quite limited. The succession of appointments, by Conference, has been, to the Gilford Church,—Rev. A. R. Lunt, — Knott, James Morrison, — Hardy, — Berry and — Tisdale; and in the Laconia Church, the appointments have been well-chosen and good.

The Catholic portion of the community have had church privileges at Laconia, where a church was built about 1850. It was afterwards burned by lightning, and rebuilt. It is a large and well-built edifice, and has a numerous constituency and attendants from both Gilford and Laconia.

The Adventists have had a chapel at Lake village, and for several years maintained regular services there. Likewise, the same people held services at Governor's Island, or vicinity. Nathaniel Davis preached that doctrine, and arranged for its proclamation by Miller himself and other leading advocates, at the island and vicinity, in camp-meetings and other assemblies. The faith was held by many in the east part of the town, and preached by Stephen Mooney, Abel Glidden (2d) and others. Their chapel is in Alton. Rev. J. Knowles, Jr., also embraced and advocated the doctrine.

Nathaniel Davis, in earlier times, embraced and propagated a peculiar faith of one Osgood, who rejected and discountenanced all forms of church government, or covenant, and holding a free religion.

There have been a few inhabitants holding the tenets of the Friends, Elder Robert Carr being perhaps the best known among them. There was no regular meeting of their adherents maintained in town, and the nearest Quaker meeting-houses were that near Gilmanton Academy and that near Wolfborough Bridge. These were not so distant as to be inaccessible at the times of their Yearly and Quarterly meetings. Their numbers have decreased and their Meetings are not regularly held at Gilmanton.

A few from Gilford have adopted the Shaker faith and joined the Canterbury Family, or colony of them, particularly a Knowles family, in the south part of the town, and related to the family of Elder John Knowles. The community at Canterbury was in good favor in these parts prior to the years 1840 or 1845, and were adjudged to be sincere and upright, honorably industrious and enviably ingenious, prosperous and pure. Attendance on their public Sabbath service, for recreation and curiosity, was one while quite common by young people of this and other towns. Their public services were discontinued and the attendance ceased.

To complete the list of special religionists, which, as will be seen by a careful observer, has already reached no inconsiderable breadth, there must be added the Deist and Atheist, which were not unrepresented among our sober and thoughtful population. Dr. Josiah Sawyer secured, from some source, ordination for the propagation of sentiments which he professed to hold, and which he represented and endeavored to inculcate or proclaim. These seemed to be deistical or, later, atheistical, seemingly included a certain type of annihilationism, or, at least, the non-immortality, and perhaps, more correctly, the non-existence of the soul and a future state. He was not without some following, and that on the part of persons in good intellectual and social standing, who, when elected to positions of public trust and responsibility, and consequently were required to take oath, declined to do so in the usual form on grounds of disbelief in either the Divine interposition or of the actual Divine existence.

These remarks perhaps sufficiently cover the various phases of religious life and sentiment, unless we include witchcraft and necromancy. It was once widely believed that a Mrs. Rogers and a Mrs. Clark were representatives of the world of mystery, or witchdom. Jugglery, not of the modern spiritualistic type, was indeed exercised by some, though not claiming for it any religious nature or relation. Many marvelous facts and peculiar features of ecclesiastical history might be added, which have diversified the fields of church as well as state, without exhausting the reservoirs of memory or the store-house of the common annals and tradition, but these may suffice. A word however, may be due in regard to Sabbath-schools. In the time of Mr. Nathaniel Goodhue's residence a school was opened at the Mill-House and then at the Potter's shop about the year 1820. The Baptists, and notably Miss Sally Sleeper, afterward missionary to Siam were enthusiastic in the new type of Christian work. During the following half-century this means of religious instruction and moral culture has been made a prominent feature of church labor in all of the evangelical churches of the town.

Military History.—The matter and the facts embraced in the military history of the town are worthy of mention, and no less important and interesting than those of other departments. The Revolutionary War began, but was not ended, before there were any settlers occupying seats on the soil of the present town of Gilford, and hence we may not expect to find men from this place in the Revolutionary army. Yet there were men there who afterwards were some of our own citizens, as, for example, Thomas Frohock, one of the men in the battle of Bunker Hill (one of the three-months' men, serving from April 23d to August 1, 1775). He knew no fatigue, and would accept no relief while the redoubt on Breed's Hill was being constructed in the night of preparation before that eventful day, June 17, 1775. He was one of one hundred and fifty-one men in Gilmanton between the ages of sixteen and fifty, according to the military census taken in that year, twelve of whom went to the front at the first call of the American cause. He also re-enlisted in 1776 and served three months and eight days under Washington at New York, and was one of the thirty-six men enlisted in that year; and the family name was originally Sparhawk, or Sparrow-Hawk, but to escape British apprehension and execution for deserting the British cause before this, the changed name Frohock was taken and has been ever since retained. Before the close of the war Gilmanton had furnished one hundred and twenty-five enlisted men, among whom are other names of Gilford inhabitants, as Major Jabez James, John Cotton, Benjamin Libbie, Lieutenant Samuel Ladd, David Clough, Abel Hunt, Enoch Hunt, Mr. Page, Ichabod Buzzell, Jacob Jewett, Jeremiah Bartlett and others. A part of the militia was called into service in 1781 and ten men went. The afterwards-organized militia called for two companies of infantry from Gilford proper; also a rifle company and light infantry company and some artillerymen and cavalrymen.

As the territory was first settled in the time of the Revolutionary War, so it was set off and incorporated into a township in the time of the War of 1812. Born and reborn amid the throes of civil strife, she would be expected to inherit a somewhat belligerent nature and develop into a championship. Into this war she, as the youngest municipality, sent her honorable quota. Nor were her sons wanting in courage when the conflict grew severe. There were three drafts made for the army and many watchers went to the Canada line to stand as sentinels and watchers on our borders. The men were Joseph York, Stephen Langley (who had settled near the Benjamin Libbey place, by Long Bay), Frank Bowman, who lived near the Weirs and who died in the army. He was an Indian doctor and said to be a Prussian. He was one while located at the Stone-Dam Island, then previously at or near the Weirs; Daniel Foster, Joseph Libbey going to the line; Ira Seabury to go to Portsmouth; and from Captain Bradford's company,—Lieutenant Henry Mallard, who was a carpenter; and Mark Chase, who went as a substitute. Captain Mason led his company to the line. Lieutenant Samuel Leavitt was officer in Mason's company. The men of 1812 were mainly sent to Portsmouth. The spirit of resistance ran high, and yet there were opposers.

The matter of pension was not hotly handled in those days. Lieutenant Phillbrick Rand was prominent in military affairs. So was also Lieutenant John Gilman. The distress was considerable, but not extreme, on account of the war.

The organization of the militia and its annual muster were continued till about 1855, when the old organization was abolished and muster was no longer required, and so this gala season was lost sight of, to a great relief.

Under the old régime, the Tenth Regiment was raised in the original towns of Gilmanton and Barnstead, or, later, of Gilford, Gilmanton and Barnstead. The muster-field, in earlier years, was at Lower Gilmanton; but in later years it was by circuit, held, in turn, at Gilford and Barnstead also.

The law required a company parade and drill in the month of May annually, and for preparation for the regimental parade a company drill was practiced, at the option of the officers and company, in September, a short time previous to the annual muster, and besides these three regular parades there were also occasionally other special drills. The officers in the regiment, the commissioned ones, also had a regimental drill before the muster, at which arrangements for muster-day were made between the regimental and the subordinate company officers and orders given accordingly.

The men of Gilford who held regimental and higher official rank were Peasley Hoit, Ebenezer Stevens, Benjamin F. Weeks and George W. Weeks, successively, colonels; and John M. Potter, J. Q. Merrill and Daniel K. Smith, majors; Nathan Weeks, regimental staff-officer; J. J. Morrill, general; Major Robie, drum-major; J. M. Potter, adjutant.

The independent companies, Riflemen and Light Infantry, received their arms and equipments from the State, and they were usually uniformed. The Rifle Company was of later organization and enlisted from the north part of the town. The Light Infantry company was enlisted mainly from Meredith Bridge.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. E. J. COLE.

Hon. Benjamin James Cole, son of Isaac and Hannah (Atwood) Cole, was born in Franconia, N. H., September 28, 1814.

James Cole, the first of the name in America, came to the Plymouth Colony in 1633, and was granted lands on Leyden Street, Plymouth, in 1637. His descendants scattered to various parts of New England, and we find the name a prominent one in Rowley, Mass. The family is an old and honored one, and, in the early part of the eighteenth century, the great-grandfather of Benjamin James Cole was a man of solid worth and property in Rowley. Among his numerous children was Solomon, born in 1742. The family was strongly patriotic, and Solomon and his brothers performed twenty-seven years' service in the colonial army of the Revolution. Solomon was engaged throughout the war, participated in the battle of Bunker Hill and in numerous other engagements, and was wounded at Chippewa Plains. The house in which he was born is still standing in Rowley, and occupied by one of the name, Caleb Cole.

Solomon married a Barker, and had eight sons,—Timothy, John, Isaac, Benjamin, Solomon, Kimball, Samuel and Asa,—and was one of the stalwart men to whose patriotic principles, firmness of purpose and religious character so much of our modern prosperity is due. He was of medium size, pleasant and social manners and a tailor by trade. He lived in Rowley and Methuen until 1796. From that time until his death, in 1835, at the age of ninety-three, he resided with his sons, Isaac and Rev. Samuel, in Landaff and Lisbon, N. H. (Samuel was a minister of the gospel for forty years, and his son, Rev. Moores Cole, has been in the Christian ministry forty-eight years.)

Isaac Cole was born in Rowley, Mass.; became first a cooper, then a carpenter; married Hannah Atwood when he was about twenty-three, and settled in Chester, N. H. (Mrs. Cole was a woman of deep religious principle, who carried her belief into daily life. She was a native of Atkinson, N. H., and a cousin of Harriet Atwood, who married Rev. Mr. Newell, and was one of the first female missionaries who went to India from the United States.) Mr. Cole lived in Chester for a few years, when, purchasing new lands in Landaff, he removed thither and gave his name to "Cole's Hill." His nature did not incline to agriculture, and, about 1813, he went to Franconia to assume the superintendence of the wood-working department of the New Hampshire Iron Manufacturing Company, located there, and continued in this position eight years. In 1821 he changed his residence to Salisbury (now Franklin village), where he constructed one of the first foundries built in New Hampshire. This he conducted six years, when, in 1827, the very great advantage afforded at "Batchelder's Mills" (now Lake village), in Gilford, induced his removal to that place. Here he established the small foundry which was the germ of the large works of the present Cole Manufacturing Company, and was carried on by him nine years. He was an active man, of mechanical aptitude, of great industry and a worthy member of the Free Baptist Church for many years. He died aged eighty-five.

Benjamin James Cole was seven years old when his father removed to Salisbury, and had the advantages of education afforded by the public schools of that town and Noyes Academy until he was thirteen, afterwards attending Sanbornton Academy. When about nineteen he was, for nearly a year and a half, unable to attend either to study or business, by reason of ill health. In December, 1836, in connection with his older brothers, Isaac and John A., he purchased the foundry of his father at Lake village, and succeeded to his business, taking the firm-title of "Cole & Co." This firm continued operations, and, in 1846, it became "Cole, Davis & Co." This co-partnership had an existence of ten years, when, in 1857, Mr. Cole became sole proprietor, and conducted it until 1873 under the name of "B. J. Cole & Co." The various demands for his manufacture had steadily developed, from the small iron foundry established by his father, a diversified and rapidly-increasing business, necessitating the erection of new and additional buildings, the introduction of machinery and a large increase of the capital invested. In 1873 the plant was taken by a stock company, incorporated as the "Cole Manufacturing Company," with a capital of sixty thousand dollars, of which all the stock was owned by Mr. Cole and family, except about eight per cent. This company has carried on extensive operations. Their annual product has ranged as high as one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, with one hundred and sixty employes, and during the present depressed times the product is about sixty thousand dollars, with sixty operatives. They construct machinery for the manufacture of various kinds of products, such as hosiery, woolen goods, lumber, paper-pulp and paper. During and after the Civil War they have made one hundred thousand dollars' worth of looms in one year. They also make a specialty of manufacturing water-wheels. In their forge and foundry they manufacture ear-axes, agricultural implements and stoves. The company has just completed eight sets of machinery for manufacturing "excelsior," which will be placed in the first mill erected for that purpose in California. The management of this corporation has been under the personal supervision of Mr. Cole. He was the treasurer and superintendent of the company until 1883, when Colonel Henry B. Quimby was elected to the superintendency on Mr. Cole's resignation. This establishment has done all the castings for the B., C. and M. Railroad since the road was built, the business of this one production amounting from ten thousand dollars to thirty thousand dollars per annum. The power for this large manufactory is given mostly by water, of which they have two hundred horse-power. They have been necessitated to use steam but a few months in thirty years' time.

M. J. Sanborn

In 1848, Mr. Cole was an incorporator of the Winnepesaukee Steamboat Company, and was elected its first president, which office he still retains, and, in 1849, with the late Captain William Walker, built the steamer "Lady of the Lake" for this company. He has built several mills and bridges on contract; was one of the incorporators of Lake Village Savings-Bank, and for ten years its president; also, one of the incorporators of the Laconia National Bank, of which he was a director ten years; and an incorporator and the present president of the Wardwell Needle Company, of Lake village. In connection with his manufacturing Mr. Cole carried on merchandising for over thirty years, and for half a century he has been intimately connected with the growth and prosperity of Lake village, and one of the vital factors of its flourishing condition.

He married, June 17, 1838, Mehitable A., daughter of Nathan and Peace (Clifford) Batchelder, of Lake village. She is a descendant, on the one side, from the celebrated colonial minister, Rev. Stephen Bachlor; on the other, from the honorable old English family of Clifford. Their children are Ellen A. and Octavia M., who married Colonel Henry B. Quimby, and has two children, Harry Cole and Candace E.

Mr. Cole was a Democrat until the breaking out of the Rebellion, in 1861; since then he has been a Republican. He represented Gilford in the State Legislature of 1849 and 1850. In 1862, 1863 and 1864 he was a candidate of the Republican party for State Senator in the Sixth Senatorial District; but as he represented a minority party, he was not elected. He was nominated and elected a member of the Governor's Council for the Second Councilor District, and served as such in the years 1866 and 1867. He was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1868. He was a delegate to the National Republican Convention which renominated Lincoln at Baltimore, in 1864. He is a member of the Free-Will Baptist Church and a trustee of New Hampton Institution.

Mr. Cole is a man of influence in his town and church, and throughout a large business acquaintance. He has a kind, social and affectionate nature, and cherishes home and friends. He has a winning personal magnetism, which makes for him many friends. To these he is loyal, and he enjoys, to an unusual degree, the marked confidence of the better portion of society and leading business men. He is generous in the highest degree in contributing to religious and charitable objects, and no case of deserving need or suffering ever appealed unsuccessfully to him. He is not only a prominent and leading business man, an active temperance worker, but, higher yet, a consistent Christian, whose active zeal has done much for the church and society of his locality.

CAPTAIN WINBORN A. SANBORN.

In the "History of Belknap County" it is fitting that there should be a record of Captain Sanborn, who was so widely and pleasantly known, and so intimately identified with steamboat navigation on Lake Winnepesaukee, and to whose energy and enterprise the development of that beautiful summer resort, Weirs, is largely due.

WINBORN ADAMS SANBORN, whose life commenced December 13, 1810, in Gilford, N. H., was the eldest of the four sons of Samuel Gilman and Sally (Mason) Sanborn. The Sanborn family is of English origin, the name being derived from the parish bearing the name Sanborn. The emigrant, John (son of John, who married, in England, the daughter of Rev. Stephen Bachlor), came to America in 1632, and to Hampton, N. H., in 1640. He was a man of note, with the title of lieutenant. One of his descendants in the seventh generation was Samuel Gilman Sanborn, a man of marked ability, who was born March 20, 1787, on the Sanborn homestead, in Gilford, which was the first land cleared in the Weirs district, and the home of his ancestors from the first settlement. When a mere lad, his ardent desire was for an education, and, in response to his earnest request, he was permitted to attend the academy at Sanbornton Square for a few terms. The sacrifices his parents made in order to pay his expenses were amply rewarded by his progress. He was, for many years, a successful teacher. He was a man of intelligence in public affairs, served his town many years as selectman and representative, held a commission as justice of the peace for a long period, and was universally known as "Squire" Sanborn. After a useful, honored and respected life, he died at the age of eighty-two, upon the farm where he and his wife had lived for nearly sixty years. Sally (Mason) Sanborn, his wife, was the daughter of Captain Lemuel B. and Molly (Chamberlain) Mason, of Durham, N. H. Captain Mason was among the early settlers of Gilford. He was a Revolutionary soldier, having joined the Continental army at Portsmouth when only sixteen years of age, and remained in constant service till the close of the war. He also enlisted and took part in the War of 1812. When the division of Gilmanton took place, according to the family tradition, corroborated by the testimony of the old inhabitants, he was invited to name the new town, which he called Guilford, from the battle of Guilford Court-House, S. C., in which he was an active participant.

Winborn Adams Sanborn (8) received his name in remembrance of the gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Winborn Adams, who bravely fought and lost his life during the Revolution, at Stillwater. His early life was passed upon the farm aiding his father in his labors. His opportunities for learning were extremely limited, and his only chance for an education, beyond a few weeks at the district school each year, was one term at "Master" Leavitt's select school at Meredith, and two terms at Gilford Academy. Books and newspapers were scarce; but the few that fell into his hands were eagerly perused, and their contents carefully stored in his memory. By improving his leisure moments he became a man of rare intelligence. To the last of his days he never allowed a newspaper to be carelessly destroyed. When only seventeen, he began teaching, and for several winters taught in Gilford and adjoining towns. His life was uneventful, and his active and energetic nature was not content with quietude, and, at the age of twenty, he left home to carve out his future alone and unaided. With his love of adventure, he went to Massachusetts and engaged as a common sailor for a twelve months' voyage on an East India trading-vessel, bound from Salem to Bombay, India. To a country boy, who had never been beyond the capital of his own State, a sea-faring life was particularly attractive; but, to gratify his parents, he relinquished his plan of following the sea as a vocation, after this voyage. His neatly-written log-book is still preserved. In 1833 he became the first commander of the "Belknap," the first steamboat on Lake Wimpesaukee. At the end of two seasons he gave up his position, and, with his love of adventure still unabated, started west. He first stopped at Wheeling, Va., where he at once secured a situation as assistant teacher in Wheeling Academy; then, allured by the letters of a friend, he journeyed to St. Louis. He readily found employment, but was soon compelled to return home on account of ill health. The entire journey—going and returning—from New Hampshire to St. Louis was by stage over the Allegheny Mountains. (Postage between the two places was twenty-five cents a letter.)

On arriving in New Hampshire, he resumed the command of the "Belknap." After a few seasons, he left this position to establish himself as a "country trader" at Alton Bay. In this undertaking, he was financially unsuccessful; but, with unflinching courage, he tried again,—this time as book-keeper for "Isaac & Seth Adams," iron founders, of South Boston, Mass. Here, by a faithful discharge of his duties, he won the confidence of his employers, and the strong friendship thus formed continued to the end of their lives. All his leisure moments were now given to the study of machinery, and, in a short time, he became an engineer of one of the harbor steamers. He soon procured a better situation as engineer of the steamer "Decatur," running between Boston and Newburyport, and retained this position till he was offered and accepted a more lucrative one as engineer of the steamer "Ohio," on the same route. While here, a long and distressing illness began, and he once more returned to his home in Gilford, where, for two years, he was unable to attend to any business.

In the winter and spring of 1851 he superintended the construction of the "Dover" at Alton Bay, and, on its completion, became its captain, and continued in that office for several summers, his winters being mainly passed upon his farm, in Gilford. In the fall of 1852 his friends and old employers, Isaac & Seth Adams, needed a man of trust, and secured him to superintend the erection of machinery in Cienfuegos, Cuba, where he passed several months. In 1863, he became a large stockholder in, and the captain of, the "Lady of the Lake." In the fall of 1869, Captain Sanborn, with his brother, went on a pleasure trip to Florida, and, while there, found a good opening for the lumber business; and the next spring, 1870, he formed a partnership with Charles L. Hoyt, a fellow-townsmen, purchased a saw-mill and commenced the manufacture of lumber in Fernandina. When he relinquished navigation, in 1869, he fully expected to exclusively devote himself to his Florida interests; but his natural liking for a seaman's life and the power of habit were too strong for this, and, in 1878, he again became captain of the "Lady," which position he occupied until the time of his death. As captain, he came in contact with people from all parts of the United States, and his courtesy, combined with his extended knowledge gained by travel, reading and discriminating powers of observation, speedily won their friendship. During this time, however, he continued the southern business, which had now become extensive, embracing the manufacture and wholesaling of lumber, merchandising, etc. In 1880, in addition to his many other cares, he conceived the idea of building a hotel at Weirs. With him to think was to act, and in six weeks from the time the sills were laid, "Hotel Weirs" was ready for occupancy. Of all his enterprises, this interested and pleased him the most.

In 1835, Captain Sanborn married Lavinia Peaslee Hoyt, a very fine-looking and intelligent woman, only daughter of James Hoyt, Jr., and his wife, Ruth (Ayer) Gordon. Mrs. Sanborn was born in Gilford, and died on the home farm, April 20, 1877. Of their two children, the son died in infancy; the daughter, Ellen E., married Captain John S. Wadleigh, the present commander of the "Lady."

While in the full possession of all his faculties, after a brief illness, Captain Sanborn met death as bravely as he had life, at Fernandina, Fla., February 21, 1882. His remains were brought to Gilford, and deposited, with Masonic rites, in the family burial-place, March 3, 1882.

In politics, Captain Sanborn was one of the "Old Guard" Abolitionists. He represented his native town two years in the Legislature. He was, for many years, an active member of Mount Horeb Commandery of Knights Templar, F. and A. M. He was decided in his views, yet charitable to all; in religion a "Liberal;" sincere in his friendships; generous to the needy, yet unostentatious in his manner of giving. He was courageous, self-reliant, strong in his convictions, and his keen observation and well-balanced mind enabled him to decide promptly and justly in matters of importance. He possessed the soundest common sense and that practical view of matters that made him competent to guide his own affairs with discretion and give helpful advice and counsel to others. The humane side of his being was quickly and energetically responsive. All the ties of nature and of friendship rooted deeply in his soul, and whoever won his confidence found in him a rare and valued friend.

REV. K. S. HALL.¹

Rightly to estimate achievement in any department, account must be taken alike of the impelling and repelling forces, the aids and hindrances, the encouragements and rebuffs, which have combined to make it what it is. Heredity, social position, wealth, poverty, dictate most careers. Social aptitude, wise training and family influence send countless numbers of men triumphantly to their goal; while the want of these often makes every step wearisome and success well-nigh impossible. The thoughts of one man move to the music of rhyme and rhythm, and he cannot but choose to be a poet. Those of another clothe themselves in the sonorous language, the felicitous expressions of an orator; the imagination of a third is an exhaustless fountain, overflowing in pen-pictures which delight the world. We admire the result; yet we remember that the genius of each was given, not won. An illustrious name, an attractive physique, a graceful address, smooth the way for merit, commend it to notice, make it conspicuous to the common eye, and this we perceive. It is the battle which is fought without adventitious aid, but against the odds of hostile circumstances, which excites our deepest sympathy and our most hearty praise. These ideas apply with striking force to Rev. King Solomon Hall, of Lake village, N. H. He was born in Groton, N. H., October 22, 1819, the offspring of Josiah and Sarah White Hall. His father died when he was three years old, leaving a family of six children in circumstances of indigence, mainly dependent for support on their widowed mother. At the age of seven he went to reside in a farmer's family, where he remained about seven years. The facilities offered him in childhood for acquiring an education were extremely limited. From the age of six to fourteen he attended the district school about six weeks each year in winter, none being held in summer. These were kept in private houses, no school-house having been built until after he left the district. The seats and desks were of the rudest pattern, the former being made of slabs, with legs fitted into the oval sides. In very cold weather it was necessary for comfort to draw the seats around the open fire. The childhood of Mr. Hall was overcast with many shadows. While kindly cared for, as the world goes, his sources of pleasure were few; his mother's companionship cheered him in his early tasks, and his father's voice was silent in the grave. The elasticities of youth were checked and left a deep impression on his future character. The stern battle of life was begun. At the age of fifteen he found employment in a factory in Lowell, where he remained about four years. In the spring of 1839 he attended a select school, taught by Miss Spaulding, at Rumney, where, at the age of nineteen, he commenced the study of English grammar. The writer, a member of the same school, well remembers how keenly he felt the loss of early training, and how deeply he deplored the fact that he was so far behind many so much younger than himself. But a new revelation inspired him with fresh zeal. He clearly saw the necessity of educational acquisition. A new life opened before him, which was filled with promise, though many discouragements darkened his daily life. He had no advantages of early study; consequently his abilities for acquisition were not rapid. But he was thoroughly in earnest, and he here developed the careful and patient investigation which were marked characteristics of his after-career. In the autumn of the same year he entered the Academical Department of the New Hampton Institution and graduated from the theological department of the same school in 1845. The writer, a room-mate for two years, clearly recalls his heroic struggles during this critical period of his life. He was entirely dependent on his own earnings for support. Not the gift of a dollar did he ever receive from a relative after he was seven years of age. But some friends in Rumney and New Hampton, touched by his manly efforts to secure an education, rendered him some assistance, which, although small in amount, was most gratefully received. He taught school during the winters, together with evening schools in singing, writing and geography; and during the latter part of his connection with the institution, besides occasionally preaching elsewhere, he regularly supplied, for several terms, the pulpit of the Baptist Church in Danbury, frequently walking fifteen miles to reach an appointment.

During one term, while other students were engaged in recreation, he cultivated the soil, giving the proceeds for a copy of "The Religious Encyclopedia." But these struggles with adverse elements were not without reward. He never grew discouraged, and these fierce contests were daily developing into a sturdy manhood. With self-reliance came firmness and moral strength. He was solitary, perhaps a native feature of his character, enhanced by the surroundings of his boyhood and his earliest recollections, mingled with poverty and the laborious toil of his mother's needle. Still, he was always cheerful, and had a host of friends.

The frivolities and merry-makings, in which too many of the young men engaged, had no allurements for him. His aims in life were too serious, his efforts too arduous, his time too precious to give to any hours spent in such amusements, the glitter of even a passing pleasure.

In the first term of his academic course he had become deeply interested in a religious life, and, in November, 1839, he was baptized and received into the Baptist Church in Rumney, and by the same licensed to preach in September, 1840. During this period of his life he had the aid of high religious convictions, and in his greatest straits found comfort and strength from the Father, who, out of this severe discipline, was to raise an efficient helper in his earthly vineyard. The same patient study was continued. No subject was left until thoroughly understood; and what had been somewhat slowly acquired was not forgotten. He graduated with credit to himself and with the confidence and well-wishes of the entire faculty. His after-life belongs to the Baptist denomination of the State. He was ordained a pastor of the Baptist Church in Hopkinton, N. H., April 22, 1846, having supplied them regularly from the September previous.

On the 30th of July, 1847, at Warner, he was married to Ann Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. Caleb and Eliza Follansbee Buswell. He was dismissed September 30, 1851; settled with the church at Lake village October 1, 1851; dismissed February, 1859; with the Merrimack Street Church, Manchester, March 30, 1859; dismissed October 1, 1862; with the church at Methuen, Mass., October 1, 1862; dismissed April 30, 1867; with the church at Lake village May 1, 1867; dismissed August 1, 1880; with the church at Rumney April 17, 1881; dismissed October 1, 1883.

It is safe to say that, during this long period of thirty-seven years of active pastoral work, the ministry of Mr. Hall was remarkably successful. He was thoroughly devoted to his calling, and his whole heart was enlisted in the salvation of mankind. He was warmly welcomed to the several churches at his settlements, and when the stern decree of duty called him away there were very many grieving friends.

The amount of good that he accomplished will never be known until the veil is lifted from the future.

He will have many stars in the crown of his rejoicing. As an illustration applicable to all his parishes, I quote from the history of the First Baptist Church in Methuen, published in the Minutes of the Association for 1880; after speaking of special trials, it says:

"The coming of Mr. Hall at this time was very opportune, and gave encouragement to the church to renew their diligence and consecrate themselves to the work of God. He was especially adapted to the field, and by his genial manner, dignified bearing and sympathetic heart won not only the hearts of his church and congregation, but the respect of the community. His labors were frequently referred to now among the elder members of his church, and his kindness is cherished with tender recollection by those who shared it in times of trials and sorrow.

His labors were blessed to the strengthening of the church and a continuance of harmony and spiritual activity. In the spring of 1866 there was a quiet-keeping of the church and many were added, who became useful and efficient helpers. . . . Having labored earnestly and successfully for almost five years, Mr. Hall resigned his pastoral care March 27, 1867. The church, being anxious to have him continue his labors, urgently requested him to reconsider his determination and remain with them. Still adhering to his purpose, the church very reluctantly accepted his resignation."

But the labors of Mr. Hall were not by any means confined to those pertaining strictly to his profession. His reputation extended far beyond his pastorates, and he became a power in the denomination throughout the State. His advice was widely sought. He was deeply interested in educational institutions, and his keen insight and patient endeavor fully equipped him to be of great service in this direction. All charitable organizations of merit found in him an active helper. His has been truly a busy life. Among his published works are some twenty or more reports as school committee of various dates for the towns of Hopkinton, Meredith and Laconia, N. H., and Methuen, Mass.; reports as school commissioner for Belknap County for 1854, 1855, 1858 and 1859; report of the New Hampshire Board of Education to the Legislature, 1855; seventh and eighth annual reports of the board of trustees of the New Hampshire State Normal School; seventeen reports as secretary of the New Hampshire Baptist Convention; discourse delivered at the funeral of Mrs. Martha R. Herrick, wife of Rev. J. S. Herrick, Rumney, N. H.; the first half-century of the First Baptist Church in Methuen, Mass., 1865. The honorary degree of A.M. was conferred on him by Dartmouth College in 1860; that of D.D. by Central University, Iowa, in 1882. Mr. Hall was a member of the New Hampshire Board of Education for Belknap County for four years; secretary of the board in 1855, and chairman in 1858. He was for several years a trustee of New Hampton Academical and Theological Institution, previous to its removal to Vermont; and for twenty years held the same position in regard to the New London Literary and Scientific Institution (now Colby Academy). He was also a trustee of the New Hampshire State Normal School for seven years, from 1872, and for two years secretary of the board. He was secretary and treasurer of the New Hampshire Baptist Pastoral Association from 1851 to 1861 inclusive. He was a trustee of the New Hampshire Baptist Convention from 1849 to 1862 and from 1867 to 1878, and secretary of the same from 1856 to 1862 and from 1867 to 1878—in all seventeen years. In all these various trusts, strict fidelity to duty, an unwavering integrity and an unvarying courtesy were the marked characteristics of his office.

The great measure of success which has attended his career, Mr. Hall cheerfully claims is largely due to his wife, who, by her ability and liberal culture, combined with strict economy, industry and tact, has proved a helpmate in so many ways for nearly forty years.

Martin A. Hayes

Mr. Hall does not possess the qualities that make what the world would call a brilliant man. Conclusions do not come to him as intuitions or startling revelations.

His grasp of mind, always comprehensive, is too massive to move by electricity.

Results are rather worked out by careful investigation. Conscientious in every fibre of his being, he desires clearly to see the right. Consequently he has always been a safe counselor, and his judgments have seldom failed. As a pastor, he has been prudent and watchful, pure and dignified in his daily life, always casting oil upon troubled waters. His heart has always been open to the anguish of suffering or the wail of sorrow.

In his religious views, it seems unnecessary to say that he has always been a Baptist to the core. To him the doctrines of the Bible are clear and explicit and a living truth.

But he is exceedingly catholic and tolerant of the views of others, as it would be a part of his nature to be. Firm and uncompromising in what he believes to be the teachings of the Scriptures, and in his preaching never withholding them, he would not willingly injure the feelings of a single human being.

Mr. Hall is not a controversialist for the sake of argument. There is nothing pugnacious in his nature. He loves those things that tend to peace. Still, when principle is involved, he is firm and even aggressive. An indomitable perseverance is one of his marked characteristics. Without this quality, he never would have achieved success. Indeed, his better aspirations would have been utterly crushed in early life; and by this alone he has borne the most serious responsibilities and carried through the greatest enterprises of his life.

Mr. Hall has, from his earliest boyhood, been a staunch temperance advocate, having never drunk a glass of intoxicating liquor as a beverage, nor used a particle of tobacco in any form. Besides lecturing on temperance, he has always sought to persuade young men to abstain from the use of these stimulants, and he has joyful reason to believe that, through his earnest efforts, many children and youth have been saved from the terrible evils of intemperance.

Since his return to Lake village, Mr. Hall has found recreation and pleasure in fruit-culture, particularly that of grapes and pears, of which he has had on his grounds about fifty varieties of each. Premiums for the best show of these fruits have been repeatedly awarded him by the Grafton and Belknap Counties Agricultural Fairs.

Long-continued illness alone compelled him to relinquish the active work of the ministry; with returning health, many pulpits would be gladly opened to him. But it is not probable that he will enter upon another pastorate. He and his worthy wife are living quietly in their pleasant home at Lake village, where so many hope that the evening of their days may be spanned with the bow of promise.

He is still frequently called to the bridal and the funeral. His interest is in no manner relaxed in the success of Christian effort; and as the shadows begin to gather, a long life devoted to the welfare of his kind grows luminous with a brightness which merges into the glories of the hereafter. This hastily-prepared sketch is the tender testimonial of an old schoolmate and a life-long friend. To those, so few of whom are living, who know the privations of his childhood and youth and the heroic struggle of his early manhood, out of which came ultimate success, it will not seem like words of adulation, but a calm and dispassionate rehearsal of some of the events and characteristics of a valuable life.

MARTIN ALONZO HAYNES.

Martin Alonzo Haynes comes from old Puritan stock, being a descendant, in the eighth generation, from Samuel Haynes, who came over from England, in 1635, in the ship "Angel Gabriel;" was wrecked at Penaquid (now Bristol) Me., in the great hurricane of 15th of August, same year; finally settled at Portsmouth, N. H., in the parish of Greenland, in 1650; was one of the nine founders and a deacon of the First Congregational Church of Portsmouth; was a selectman from 1653 to 1663, and held many other offices of trust.

The subject of this sketch was born at Springfield, N. H., July 30, 1842, and four years later his parents removed to Manchester, N. H.

His father, Elbridge G., was for thirty years a prominent figure in the city's history, noted for his unswerving convictions, his old-fashioned integrity and sound judgment and his interest in public affairs.

He was anxious that his children should enjoy better advantages than had been his in youth, and the outbreak of the Civil War found Martin, his oldest child, with a good High-School education and the printer's trade acquired. But President Lincoln's first call for troops found the boy of eighteen ready, and he enrolled his name and was mustered into the "Abbott Guard," the first company to enter the camp of the First Regiment at Concord. Before leaving the State the company was transferred to the Second Regiment and re-enlisted for three years.

Shortly after the regiment's arrival at Washington he was appointed clerk to the regimental commissary; but when the first advance was made into Virginia, learning the arrangements contemplated his remaining back in camp, he threw up his clerkship in disgust, demanded his musket and took his place in the ranks of his company.

It is his boast that he served as a private soldier for three years, that he participated in every engagement of the regiment from Bull Run to Cold Harbor, that he never answered to "surgeon's call" and was never a day off duty.

He was three times slightly wounded,—at First Bull Run, in the neck by a splinter from a fence-rail, while defending, late in the day, the sunken road, immediately in front of the Henry house; at Glendale, receiving a severe contusion in the groin from a spent ball; at Second Bull Run, in the famous bayonet charge of Grover's Brigade, when the Second Regiment pierced two rebel lines of battle, he received a savage blow in the face and bled profusely, but carried out of the mêlée the wounded Lieutenant Rogers, who died in his arms.

In this affair the regiment lost 132 out of 332 men. At Gettysburg, where the regiment rendered the "Peach Orchard" famous and suffered the terrible loss of 193 out of 354 engaged, the three men nearest him in line were all wounded by fragments from one shell, but he escaped unmarked.

Upon his return from the war he resumed newspaper work at Manchester for a while, serving upon the editorial staff of the Daily Mirror and Daily Union, until he left to take the position of clerk and paymaster of the Rockingham Mills, at Portsmouth, N. H. He remained there until the suspension of the mills—about a year.

In January, 1868, in company with Benjamin F. Stanton, he founded the Lake Village Times newspaper, and has retained control of the paper ever since, with the exception of the first three years, as sole proprietor.

He represented the town of Gilford in the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1872 and 1873, in the first year serving as chairman of the committee on fisheries, in the latter as chairman of the military committee. He was an aide-de-camp on the staff of Governor Prescott, with the rank of colonel. In 1876 he was appointed clerk of the Circuit Court and the Superior Court of Judicature for Belknap County, retaining the position until 1883, when he resigned to take a seat in the National Congress. In 1881 and 1882 he served as president of the New Hampshire Veteran Association, which he turned over to his successor not only free from debt, but with several thousand dollars' worth of buildings for the accommodation of its annual reunions at Weirs. He was also Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Hampshire, during the same years.

Upon the approach of the fall elections of 1882 his old comrades-in-arms brought his name forward for the Republican nomination to Congress from the First New Hampshire District, and after a canvass which is memorable in the history of New Hampshire politics he was nominated in the convention, at Dover, and elected in November by an unprecedented plurality of nearly thirty-eight hundred. In 1884 he was renominated by acclamation in the convention held at Wolfeborough, and received nearly twenty-five hundred plurality at the polls, his opponent being Rev. L. F. McKinney, of Manchester, one of the ablest and most popular men of his party in the State. In both elections he ran very far ahead of his ticket, receiving hundreds of Democratic votes.

He was married, in 1863, to Miss Cornelia T. Lane, of Manchester, and two daughters survive to bless their pleasant home, which is delightfully situated in Lake village, surrounded with fruit and forest-trees and looking down upon the waters of Lake Winnepesaukee.

He has delivered many addresses and poems at soldiers' reunions and gatherings; but his chief literary work was a "History of the Second Regiment," copies of which are now eagerly sought for by collectors. He is decidedly a man of the people, makes friends and keeps them, and delights in the sports of gun and rod.

JOHN S. CRANE.

Among the vigorous, active and successful men of Belknap County must be mentioned John Summerfield Crane, of Lake village. He was born in Springfield, Mass., February 3, 1834, and was son of Luther and Rebecca (Mauter) Crane.

The Crane family has been a representative one in various spheres, in New England from the days of its first settlement. Jasper Crayne was one of the founders of the New Haven colony, signed its "fundamental agreement" June 4, 1639, and became one of its leading and influential members. Another branch of the same family settled in Berkley, Mass., at its first settlement, and the descendants of this pioneer have ever held positions of responsibility, and been represented in every generation in medicine, law and theology. Henry Crane settled in Dorchester early. His descendants are numerous. One of them, John, was a pioneer of Taunton, and he is the progenitor of the numerous families of that name in Norton and Canton. Luther Crane was a native of the latter town, but, owing to the incompleteness of the records, we find it impossible to give the exact line from Henry.

John S. Crane not only descends from good paternal stock, but his mother, a native of Plymouth, Mass., was a lineal descendant of the famous Governor and writer of "Plymouth Colony," William Bradford. From such a stock we should expect good offspring, and when we see the odds against which Mr. Crane has been compelled to battle, and the signal success that has attended his career from the humble condition of his boyhood up to the station he now occupies of a leading and wealthy manufacturer, we must concede to him his full share of the ability of his strong progenitors, and acknowledge him as one who, in the highest sense of the term, is a "self-made" man.

Luther Crane was a latter, of an ingenious and mechanical nature, and was employed by the Hamilton Cotton Manufacturing Company as a spinner in the first cotton-mill in Lowell. He then removed to Ohio, and when John was nine years old came to Salmon Falls, N. H., where he became a resident. John was a lad of quick conception, and made good progress during his attendance at the district school and South Berwick Academy. His skill in drawing was so great that a gentleman voluntarily offered to educate him as an artist; but, with the impulsiveness of youth, he did not avail himself of this offer, and at fifteen years of age shipped as a boy before the mast on a clipper ship bound for India. The voyage lasted twenty-two months, and the vessel circumnavigated the globe. On the return from the Sandwich Islands Mr. Crane was the ship-carpenter. The hard actualities of a sailor's life dispelled his romantic dreams, and, during the long hours in which there was nothing to do but think, he decided to "make a man of himself" by honest industry and patient application. So, returning to Salmon Falls, he entered a shop to learn the trade of machinist, which was his choice from his aptitude for mechanics. Remaining here one year, he went to Lawrence for six months' labor, then to the Lowell Machine-Shop, in Lowell, conducted by Lucius Cutter. By this time he had attained proficiency in his calling, and, after six months' service here, was engaged by Lucius Waite to fit up and take charge of a sewing-machine manufactory for one year. This business was then discontinued, and Mr. Crane, after working a short time in Manchester, concluded to visit the West, and see if he could find a suitable place to establish himself with the small capital acquired by his industry and careful savings. Not finding a situation to his mind, he returned to Lowell and became the superintendent of a pattern and model-shop for one year. In 1855 he removed to Franklin, N. H., to complete and place in running order some knitting-machines for a Lowell house. This kept him busy for only a short period, and, in the spring of 1856, he began the connection with the manufacturing interests of Lake village, which has been of such value to him, and which links him with every step in the rise of an important industry in this place. He was employed by B. J. Cole to build knitting-machines for Thomas Appleton, the manufacturer. This was the introduction of this branch of manufacturing to this vicinity, and began a new and successful era in its progress. He worked for Mr. Cole six months, and then made a contract with Mr. Appleton to build knitting-machines at his mill, and, about the same time (fall of 1857), became his superintendent. These positions he occupied until the spring of 1862. Designing and perfecting, in connection with John Pepper, what was called the "Pepper Knitting-Machine," he then took the contract to build the machines, and, with William Pepper, formed the firm of Crane & Pepper. They began work with fifteen operatives, in a building owned by B. J. Cole, and constructed from fifteen to twenty machines per month. They were burned out about 1863, and John Pepper built a new shop for the firm on the site of the old Small mill. About this time Mr. Crane, Benjamin F. Peaslee, of Lake village, and Thomas Joyce, of Boston, formed the Winnepesaukee Hosiery Company, purchased the machinery of the Pulsifer mill, and, in 1864, began the manufacturing of hosiery, employing thirty hands, with Mr. Peaslee in charge and Mr. Crane as superintendent. In December, 1864, Mr. Crane purchased the interests of his partner, and after running the works till March, 1865, sold the whole to R. M. Bailey. The manufacture of knitting-machines continued until about 1869, when Mr. Crane sold out this business and became connected with Walter Aikin, of Franklin, in the proprietorship of the "Gilmore Revolving Diamond Stone-Dressing Machine," for dressing mill-stones. Mr. Crane spent most of his time in Franklin, and for two years was engaged in introducing this invention to the public. Returning to Lake village, he purchased, for two thousand dollars, the interest of Charles H. Young in the firm of Young & Peaslee, engaged in manufacturing circular knitting-machines under Young's patent, and, in the spring of 1872, the firm of Crane & Peaslee began its existence with six men, and for two years made one hundred and fifty hosiery-machines a year.

In 1873, Mr. Crane designed and perfected a machine for making shirts and underwear on the same principle, which he secured by patents, and in September, 1874, moved his manufactory to its present location. The new machines became an important addition to this business, as they were rapidly called for. In January, 1875, the firm employed ten men, with a monthly pay-roll of four hundred dollars, and, in spite of the depressed times, they continued to do a most prosperous business. In November, 1878, Mr. Peaslee sold his half-interest to Mr. Crane for four thousand dollars. B. F. Drake purchased one-third interest, and the firm became J. S. Crane & Co., and they carried on the business until July, 1884, employing as high as sixteen men, and, from a production of five thousand dollars, in 1868, the business steadily increased until it amounted to fifty thousand dollars annually. Purchasing Mr. Drake's interest at the above date, Mr. Crane has since continued manufacturing under the same name, with his son as partner. They now employ from twenty to twenty-five men, and have a yearly business of seventy-five thousand dollars. Their specialties are circular knitting-machines, for hosiery, underwear, Jersey cloth and stockinet.

About 1883, Mr. Crane became jointly interested with R. F. M. Chase in a patent knit fabric,—the "stockinet,"—which bids fair to become one of the leading features of this class of goods in the country, and to assume enormous business proportions. To this Mr. Crane has given his whole attention, has invented and improved inventions, patented improvements, and also constructed machines for making Jersey cloth and stockinet. The machines of his manufacture are in use in all parts of the United States, but to the greatest extent in New England. He has taken orders for this class of machinery as high as fifty thousand dollars' worth at one time.

Mr. Crane married, in 1856, Clara J. Smith, of Nashua, a lady well fitted to appreciate and promote the artistic ideas of Mr. Crane and be an efficient associate of his life. Their only child is Mazellah L.

In politics, Mr. Crane is a pronounced Republican. He represented Laconia in the State Legislature of 1875, and Gilford in that of 1878. He was one of the incorporators and is now a director of Lake Village Savings-Bank, and belongs to the various Masonic bodies to the commandery.

Mr. Crane can attribute his success to persistent and indefatigable industry, to the close and concentrated action of mind and body and his quick and intelligent appreciation of men and things. His natural tastes are in harmony with artistic and cultured surroundings, and his business has enabled him to gratify his desires. He has designed and erected the handsomest residence in the town, a view of which appears on another page, and his home abounds in all the comforts that money will buy. He is a lover and owner of fine horses, intelligent dogs and a fine steam yacht, and is passionately fond of aquatic and field sports. He is a good citizen, a social companion, a strong friend, and, with his positive and energetic nature, may be truthfully called a good type of the rushing, active, impetuous and successful Americans of the nineteenth century.

MOSES SARGENT.

But little more than a quarter of a century had passed after the long and exhausting Revolutionary war, when manufactures were few and in their infancy, and our people were chiefly agriculturists and day laborers, compelled to exercise the utmost economy, and but a limited number were able to give their children the advantages of a liberal education, when Moses Sargent, son of Moses and Nancy (Morrill) Sargent, first saw the light of day, in the old town of Amesbury, Mass., December 16, 1803. His father was a ship-carpenter, wholly dependent on his daily labor, and when Moses was but a few years old Mr. Sargent met with an accident, which seriously crippled him for life, and incapacitated him from longer attending upon his vocation; so, at the age of nine years, the young lad was obliged to go out into the world of work and struggle for a living, not only for himself, but for his parents, without any of the adventitious aids of education or inherited rank, and with only his brave heart and willing hands.

He commenced work in a factory in Amesbury, which was the first broadcloth-factory erected in the United States. Being a good, honest, industrious, hard-working lad, he soon attracted the attention of his employers, and the agent of the factory gave him one term's schooling, when he was about thirteen, and he also wrote off the multiplication table for him to learn while at his work. But to the eagerly desirous and willing searcher for knowledge the way is made, opened or found in some manner, sooner or later, and at a school, which was kept on Sunday, by a Quaker gentleman and philanthropist, for the purpose of giving the factory operatives an opportunity to obtain some education, Moses learned the rudiments of mathematics, and took a peep into that realm of knowledge which he had so longed to enter. His diligence and rapid progress, and his wish for an education, so impressed his teacher, that when he was about sixteen he offered to pay the expenses of Moses' tuition at some good school, but as he was almost the sole dependence of his parents he was forced to decline this kind offer.

He remained for eight years in the broadcloth-factory, when Amos Lawrence and his brother, with others, under the firm-title of "A. & A. Lawrence & Co.," started a flannel-factory, where Moses engaged work and was employed for twelve years. About 1830 this firm purchased a broadcloth-factory a short distance up the river, for the purpose of using it for making satinets, and Mr. Sargent, who had grown up almost to manhood in the factories, and had made capable and good use of his time, and become a skilled and experienced workman, was given the superintendence of the putting in of the machinery and getting the manufactory in running order. He held this position for about three years, when he went to Byfield, leased a water privilege, and with one set of cards he started the manufacture of yarn in a small way on his own account. He continued in business here for two years, when his health failed and he was advised by his physician to leave the proximity of the salt water, and in December 1835, he came to Batchelder's Mills, N. H. (now Lake village), and leased a yarn-mill of the Lake Company, and fitted it up to make woolen yarn for domestic knitting purposes. Mr. Sargent was the pioneer manufacturer of this yarn in New Hampshire. He commenced with one set of twenty-four-inch cards and ten operatives, and for twenty-nine years he was engaged in this industry. The business steadily augmented, and the one set of cards was increased to five, and for the last two years Mr. Sargent himself manufactured the yarn into stockings; among his contracts, filling two for the United States government, amounting to one hundred and fifty thousand pairs.

Shortly after the close of the Civil War Mr. Sargent disposed of his business interests to the Belknap Company, of Laconia, and for about a year was not in active business. He then went to Upper Gilmanston, bought a cotton-mill, fitting it up for making cotton stockings, and carried on this manufacture for six years, employing two hundred operatives. His factory was then purchased by "A. Lawrence & Co.," who after a few years formed a stock company; fifty shares of the stock were given to Mr. Sargent, in consideration of friendship, long acquaintance and the pleasant business relations which had always existed between them.

During his residence in Upper Gilmanton he took an interest in the affairs of the town, and it was through his influence that the name was changed to Belmont. Politically, he was a Whig, and is now a Republican, and represented Belmont in the State Legislature in 1872, and its prosperity and growth is due, in a large measure, to Mr. Sargent's enterprise. He relinquished business after the sale of his interests in Belmont, and returned to Lake village, which has since been his home.

Mr. Sargent married, first, October 27, 1824, Judith, daughter of Stephen and Esther (Reynolds) Hoyt. Their children were Mary (married H. O. Heywood, has two surviving children, and resides in Lake village.); Stephen II., who now lives in Salem, Mass.; Moses, who is agent of the Gilmanton Mills, Belmont; John, deceased; David, deceased; and Frank S., now an overseer under Moses. Mrs. Judith Sargent died July 26, 1849; and Mr. Sargent married, second, Mrs. Mary Huntington (born Seavey), in February, 1850. She died December 2, 1854, and he then married, Sarah, daughter of Gilman and Sally Thyng.

Mr. Sargent has been a resident of Lake village for many years, but his devotion to business has prevented him from being especially active in its public affairs or taking official position; yet he has always contributed generously to every worthy object, public or private. He was one of the incorporators of the Lake Village Savings-Bank, and director and vice-president from its establishment until the present time. For forty years he has been a member of the Baptist Church, and conscientiously acted according to the truths and doctrines of the same. For forty years, also, he had been a member of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, and has taken an active part and taken all the degrees. His attention has been drawn somewhat in the direction of military organizations and at one time he was a lieutenant in the militia.

Mr. Sargent for more than three-score years has been a producer, and not a mere consumer, earning his own bread, and assisting his parents while yet a mere lad, and before attaining his majority he had provided a comfortable home for them. The patient industry that characterized his early years, when his daily bread and that of others was earned by the toil of his hands and the sweat of his brow; the persevering energy which he manifested when, starting from an humble beginning, he entered upon the special line of manufacturing through which he gained success,—all these are worthy of record; for, "men may come and men may go, but the work they do lives after them, and the industries they plant or aid in advancing go on after they are gathered to their fathers."

Mr. Sargent, mindful of early struggles, has assisted many young men to start in life, both with his counsel and means. Social, kind-hearted and cheerful, he is a pleasant friend; of sterling integrity and an enterprising man he has made a deep impress upon the industrial development of this section, and now, in his eighty-second year, honored and esteemed by a large number of acquaintances, there will be nowhere found a tongue to whisper aught against his integrity or his broad Christian charity.

JOSEPH CLIFFORD MOORE.

Hon. Joseph Clifford Moore, editor of the Manchester Union and the financial head of the Union Publishing Company, is a thorough representative of that valuable class known as self-made men. He is the second son of Dr. D. F. and Frances S. Moore, and was born in London, N. H., August 22, 1845. His early education was limited to the common schools, and more or less shared with labor. Later in life, having made the best of such advantages as came within his reach, he pursued with success a course of medical training at New York Medical College. From this training he returned to Lake village, the business centre of the town of Gilford, which has been his home since he was ten years of age, and entered upon the practice of medicine in partnership with his father, Dr. D. F. Moore. This was in 1866, and from that time up to his joining in the newspaper enterprise at Manchester, in November, 1879, he followed his profession with untiring industry and gratifying success. His practice extended over a wide section, and involved long hours and much arduous travel. During this time he was also active in general business enterprises.

Mr. Moore began his journalistic career without the benefit of any special training whatever, but brought to the work a clear, cool head, ripe judgment and honest purpose; but it was early apparent that he possessed that rare quality, "the newspaper faculty." Careful, prudent, cautious and conservative by nature, he applied that faculty with constantly increasing shrewdness and wisdom; so that the enterprise not only developed a remarkably rapid, but a sound and healthy, growth. Exercising good business judgment and methods, he successfully maintained the financial standing of the paper, notwithstanding the excessive demands of a rapidly-growing plant. In shaping the tone and conduct of The Union, he has uniformly aimed to give it a character for independence, integrity and respectability, advancing it on the true line of progressive modern journalism. He is a ready editorial writer on political and general topics, eschews the ornamental and descriptive, and goes straight at the meat of a matter in a plain and direct style. His methods are convincing as well as terse and vigorous.

Mr. Moore has always taken a warm and active interest in politics, not from the selfish motives of the office-seeker, but as an ardent believer in and staunch supporter of a sound, sterling and progressive Democracy. At the State election of 1880 he was elected a member of the State Senate from the Sixth Senatorial District, and filled the seat with credit to himself and his constituency. He introduced and was chiefly instrumental in securing the passage of the measure which created the present State Board of Health. Always under self-command, easy and agreeable in manner, he proved to be valuable in legislative work, and was invariably relied upon to release the Senatorial body when sharp conflict of opinion led it into a jangle. Since the expiration of this official trust his time has been given exclusively to business matters and the conduct of the Union.

In January, 1885, he was unanimously chosen president of the New Hampshire Club, an organization comprising the leading business and professional men of the State, and shortly after accompanied it on a successful excursion South. As president of this body he is broad and liberal, seeking only to develop its interests and extend its influence.

Dartmouth College, at the June commencement, 1884, conferred upon him the degree of A.M.

Mr. Moore retains his residence at Lake village, with his aged parents. He is married, but has no children. In manner he is easy and agreeable, and is favored with an excellent address and attractive personal presence. In business affairs he is careful and conservative, and at the same time enterprising. Honorable and just in his transactions, he enjoys the confidence and respect of business men. At this writing he is in the full vigor of his powers, with the promise of a useful and successful future before him.

HISTORY OF GILMANTON.

BY REV. S. S. N. GREELEY.

CHAPTER I.

THE present people and the multitudes who have gone out all over the land from the old town of Gilmanton have enjoyed opportunity to learn of the earlier history of their town from one of the most thorough and complete town histories that in its day had issued from the press. Indeed, the work was never so eagerly sought after, never so highly prized, as at the present time, though its records ended nearly forty years ago.

Personally, I have owned three or four copies together, but literary friends have "borrowed" them, litigants have desired to turn to something in "that book" which might help their case, or strangers wanted to know something about the town, or descendants of sundry ancients desired to be certain where they came from,—and so I loaned them the books, and after the passage of years can only sing in mournful cadence,—

"When shall we meet again—Meet ne'er to sever."

The historian of Gilmanton, Rev. Daniel Lancaster, for more than twenty years Congregational pastor in the town, very early in his ministry, seemed to hear the voice of Bildad the Shuhite sounding down the centuries, "Inquire, I pray thee, of the former age and prepare thyself for the search of their fathers; shall not they teach thee?" So from the fathers dead, from the aged living, from town records, church records, school records and transpiring events he brought out, at length, Lancaster's "History of Gilmanton," as he says in his preface, "at the cost of an amount of labor which none can estimate but those who have made similar attempts; a labor that has been continuous through nearly twenty years." But, in his modesty on the issue of the work, he suppressed almost one-half of it.

Some hundreds of copies passed through the bindery and were thrown on the market, when again, in his modesty, he concluded that as many copies were completed as ever would be called for and no more were issued. That was not the worst of it. Half a cart-load, more or less, of printed sheets were disposed of for wrapping paper!

The work sold for about seventy-five cents. Numbers of prominent citizens subscribed for ten, fifteen and twenty copies by way of encouragement, and gave them to friends and sold to others, as they had opportunity, till the stock is long since exhausted, and the call for the book from far and near is more imperious as the years move on, and never so earnest as it is to-day. Ten, twenty and thirty dollars are offered for a copy! This history of a history is an illustration of the increasing value of family, town and county annals, if not with cotemporaries, with generations yet unborn. All that makes up the world and life is ever changing, but "the past is with the past" and will ever stay there. It cannot be changed. It has already "put on immortality," and its events, like old monuments in Egypt, become but the more interesting the farther their age is pushed up the river of time.

If these statements are true, then this inference follows: that families to whom this new collection of town histories is offered should not fail to secure it, though at large first cost. While whole family libraries wax old and are neglected, local history becomes but the more valuable, as seen through the vista of years.

Gilmanton was incorporated in 1727. It was named and originally spelled Gilmantown, from the fact that among the grantees of a charter, issued by His Majesty, King George, there were twenty-four persons by the name of Gilman.

This charter opens with kingly dignity,—"George, by the grace of God and Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c., Greeting."

Then he would have all people know that "wee" (with concurrence of his counsel), "for the due encouragement of settling a new plantation, do give and grant, in equal shares, unto sundry of our beloved subjects that inhabit or shall inhabit within the said grant, within our province of New Hampshire, all the tract of land within the following bounds." Here follows a most liberal slice of the earth:

"From the head of Barnstead, next to the town of Chichester, thence on the N. W. line to Wimpisaukee Pond, on the river that runs out of said Pond, and from the first place where it began, to run N. E. six miles; then N. W. two miles; then due N. to Wimpisaukee Pond, then on said Pond and river to meet the first line; provided it do not encroach on any former legal grant."

His Majesty then proceeds with certain royal "conditions" to be fulfilled by the inhabitants of the town from that date "forever!" Evidently at the issuing of this instrument the geography of King George did not make a note of Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill and another "George," whose "sir-name" was Washington!

The charter was signed on the 20th of May by His Majesty's Colonial Governor, John Wentworth.

During the French War several frontier towns had been greatly tried by the raids of hostile Indians. They had pillaged, carried away and, in sad instances, murdered the early settlers. These sufferings and exposures deterred the waiting families for Gilmanton from any speedy entrance upon their granted lands. They did not sing with any great earnestness,— and the settlement of Gilmanton was delayed for a series of years. In fact, there was no permanent settlement until the close of 1761. From 1727, the year the charter was granted, until 1766, a period of nearly forty years, the town-meetings were held in Exeter.

On the memorable evening of December 26, 1761, Benjamin Mudgett and his wife, from the town of Brentwood, arrived in Gilmanton, having come that day from Epsom, a distance of not less than twelve miles, on foot. Mrs. Mudgett was the first white woman who set foot on the soil of Gilmanton, and she passed the first night in town with no other woman nearer than Epsom. On the next day, December 27th, John Mudgett and wife, with great weariness, reached town. About fifteen days later, January 10th, Orlando Weed and wife joined them, and here these three families remained through a winter of terrible severity (1762). "Snows were so frequent and so deep as to prevent passing in any direction for two months, being nearly six feet on the level." So writes Mr. Benjamin Kimball, of Concord, in his journal. Mrs. Mudgett (of the first family) was the daughter of Joshua Bean, who, by two marriages, had twenty-one children. They all came at length from the home in Brentwood about 1780, and settled in Gilmanton,—a valuable accession to the population. Mrs. Mudgett lived in Gilmanton until the inhabitants had increased in number to more than five thousand. This was before Gilford was disannexed. She died in Meredith July 9, 1834, aged ninety-five years. She was mother of the first male child born in town,—Samuel Mudgett, born February 15, 1764.

The first child born in the town was Dorothy, daughter of Orlando Weed and wife, October 13, 1762. The early families were generally large, embracing, most of them, from ten to twelve, and some even fifteen children.

"Tempora mutantur,"

In the course of the next season, 1762, seven families moved in. Many prospectors prepared to move their families the following season. Jeremiah Connor had cleared land and built a camp, and Captain Joseph Badger and his two sons, William and Joseph, had put in some seed and built a log house.

Captain Joseph Badger was one of the original proprietors, and from his first entrance into Gilmanton in person, seems to have won the respect and confidence of the settlers, and was never free from the occupancy of public trusts. Although here in the spring, in consequence of the sickness and death of his son, in the month of May, he did not remove his family from their home in Haverhill, Mass., until July. His was the eighteenth family, and at the raising of his barn that season, the first framed building erected in the town, he had, as he often afterwards related, every man, woman and child to take supper with him.

On August 1, 1763, the first minister moved his family into town, for a permanent residence,—the Rev. William Parsons. He became a proprietor of Gilmanton and was employed by the corporation to preach to the settlers, and for the first ten years was preacher and schoolmaster. Before any school-houses were furnished he taught in private houses. He was a very useful citizen, and a minister earnest and faithful, and did much to give a right direction to the early movements in regard to religious institutions.

In March, 1773, the Rev. Isaac Smith came into town, the second minister, and entered upon a pastorate of forty years.

This year came also William Sibley, the first merchant, together with Lieutenant Peter Folsom, Simeon Copp, Colonel Samuel Greeley, Lieutenant Ebenezer Eastman, Samuel and Nicholas Gilman and twenty others.

The next year, 1774, was memorable for the erection of two houses of worship,—one by the town for the use of the Congregationalists, and one by individuals for the use of the Baptists. A Congregational Church was organized, and the Rev. Isaac Smith was ordained over it. This year the town voted to build a school-house at Peaked Hill (Centre village).

But we hasten now from the toils and prosperous progress of those who struggled to make the wilderness bud and the desert blossom like the rose, to the times when the cloud of war darkened all the land. Gilmanton had now become the home of many distinguished men, lofty in character, wise in counsel, brave, patriotic, unswerving in devotion to their country and their God. Their names are illustrious in the annals of the town, and their descendants have been largely men and women worthy of their sires. They have been leading minds in town affairs, and occupants of public positions of wide responsibility.

At the opening of 1775 the Revolutionary War commenced, in which struggle Gilmanton bore an honorable part. She not only sent her representative, Colonel Antipas Gilman, to the deliberative convention called at Exeter, but these earnest men were ready also to take the field. Accordingly, a few days after the battle of Lexington, twelve of the inhabitants of Gilmanton, Lieutenant Ebenezer Eastman at their head, volunteered, and marched forth to the rescue. This officer, in the absence of the captain, commanded a company at the battle of Bunker Hill, on the 17th of June. There is an interesting story current in this connection, out of which the poet, B. F. Taylor, wove his popular effusion known as "Mary Butler's Ride."

She was the young wife of Lieutenant Eastman. When he hastened to the war she was left alone with a young child. Report soon reached her of the battle of Bunker Hill, and that her husband was among the killed. She determined to know if it was but flying rumor or serious fact for her. There were no roads, no guides but spotted trees; no carriage to convey her; but, mounting her horse, with her infant child on the saddle before her, she struck out for her father's house in Brentwood, a distance at least of forty miles. When she reached her father's house the news of the battle was confirmed, but no list of the killed or wounded.

Leaving her infant child, she mounted again, and on reaching Charlestown found her husband alive and well.

"Then up rose Mary Butler, and set her wheel at rest—
She swept the punchion floor, she washed the cottage pride—
The cottage pride of three weeks old—and dress'd him in his best,
She wound the clock that told the time his mother was a bride,
And porringer and spoon she deftly laid aside;
She strung a clean white apron across the window panes—
And wrung the kettle from the eave for fear of rusting rains,
Then toss'd the saddle on the bay, and don'd her linen gown.
Full seventy miles to Cambridge town? Bring out your civic crown!
I think 'twill fit that brow of hers, who sadly smiled and said,—
'We'll know about your father, boy, and who is hurt or dead.'"

The ancient cellar over which stood the cottage of Lieutenant Eastman is a frequented spot by summer visitors, and, till lately, scattering rose-bushes opened their fragrant annual tributes to the memory of the brave.

At a late festival of the Centre Congregational Church, a granddaughter of Mary Butler, Mrs. W. C. H. Hutchinson, came upon the platform before the audience, and spun upon that identical "wheel." Afterwards a small skein was sent to the poet (Milwaukee, Wis.), bringing from him a pleasant note of thanks, which he concludes with expressions of great joy that in these days any ladies are found that can spin.

On the 1st of December of this year (1775) the town was divided by the selectmen and a Committee of Safety into two militia companies.

By order of the Provincial Congress, a second census was taken September 25, 1775, with the following showing for Gilmanton: Males under sixteen years of age, 238; males from sixteen to fifty, 151; males above fifty, 16; males absent in the army, 12; the whole number of females, 357; negroes and slaves, 4.—total population, 778.

In the month of May, 1776, a very worthy citizen died who was a lieutenant in the militia, by the name of Joseph Philbrook, leaving a widow and two children. He had been one of the selectmen; was at the time of his death one of the building committee of the meeting-house.

His was the first silent form laid in the cemetery near the First Congregational Meeting-House (known in these later times as the "Old Smith Meeting-House").

There is a full notice in "Lancaster's History," but for a long period it did not seem to be known who it was that "lay like a warrior taking his rest" in a quiet nook in the ancient burying-place. But now, after more than a hundred years, his grave is decorated with the sweet flowers of the spring time, as comrades adorn with loving hands the graves of modern heroes who for their country died.

In July of this year sixteen soldiers were enlisted under command of Joseph Badger, Jr., in aid of the northern army. Captain John Moody enlisted twenty men and marched to New York under Washington.

At a union town-meeting of Gilmanton and Barnstead, November 22d, Joseph Badger, Esq., was chosen a representative to the Assembly to meet in Exeter in December.

In 1782, Great Britain having acknowledged the independence of the United States, there was no longer need of providing men for battle-fields. There had been enlisted in all eighty-one men.

The town of Gilmanton, after the incoming of the day when it was exultingly said "We have a Country!" made rapid strides in all the factors of municipal prosperity. It rapidly attracted immigration within its borders, and very largely immigrants of a higher order as to intelligence, culture, refinement, moral and Christian attainments.

On the 11th of March, at the annual town-meeting, the article in the warrant to bring in votes for President and representatives under the Constitution the State had now adopted, seems for the first time to have been acted upon.

March 10, 1785, a committee was chosen to divide the town into school districts. It was also voted to raise one hundred and fifty pounds for the support of schools the ensuing year. The same was voted for the following year.

In March meeting, 1778, it was "Voted, that ten dollars bounty be given for full-grown wolves, five dollars for whelps' heads, and £9 pr. head for catamounts, if killed within two months, and 26 if killed after that time." Colonel Joseph Badger, Jr., Colonel Joseph Greeley and John Shepard, Esqs., were appointed to ascertain the line on the northeast side of the school lot, and to lay out the broad highway near the meeting-house into house-lots, with a view to build up a village.

On November 29, 1790, the freemen of the town for the first time carried their votes for representatives to Congress, and for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States. The vote stood: For Representative to Congress, Thomas Cogswell, fifty-nine; for Elector, Hon. Joseph Badger, seventy-two; and they were chosen.

The town also met on the 13th of August, and appointed Thomas Cogswell, Esq., Colonel Samuel Greeley and Colonel Joseph Badger, Jr., a committee to devise a plan to detect thieves, in case there should be anything stolen.

At a meeting of the town August 8th, Colonel Thomas Cogswell was chosen a delegate to a convention, to be holden in Concord on the first Wednesday in September, to revise the Constitution. It was at this convention that the title of the chief magistrate of the State was changed from President to Governor.

In 1794, March 13th, the votes were for State and county as well as for town officers. From citizens of Gilmanston the voice of the town was for Hon. Joseph Badger, on the Governor's Council, and for representatives to the General Court, Joseph Badger, Jr., and Colonel Samuel Greeley.

It was by the zealous interest and efforts of these representatives that, on the 20th of June, the charter of the Academy was issued by the Legislature.

Passing the regular routine of business and the annual increase of population in a town now widely known and prosperous, we come to the first act of cutting up or cutting off a valued section of the town. At the town-meeting in 1792 the Upper Parish (Gunstock) presented a petition to be set off into another town. Referred to a committee of twelve.¹ In 1811, a disinterested committee was appointed to describe the boundary lines of Gunstock (so called) to be set off as a new town. This committee reported boundaries on the 31st of May. March 12th, on the petition to have the town consent by vote to set off Gunstock Parish into a separate town, the petition failed of being carried. But, on the article to see whether the town would oppose in the Legislature the application about to be made by citizens of Gunstock Parish for an act of incorporation, it was voted in the negative. The application, therefore, was successful, and, on June 16th, that part of Gilmanston known as Gunstock was disannexed, and, by act of the Legislature, erected into a separate town called Gilford.

Following thus for half a century the progress of affairs, we come to the times and doings that were within the memories of recent fathers and mothers, and in which they were actors. Minute detail from year to year is unnecessary and quite beyond the limits allowable to this sketch. Diminished by the sundering of pleasant farms and many pleasant families, there were yet left more than the constitutional "six miles square" of our newer western States. Gilmanston yet remained a grand old town, and Gilford opened new doors for new officials to fill new offices.

Gilmanston has always been and still is a "high old town!" Lifted toward heaven to an elevation surpassed only by Bethlechem, under the shadow of the White Mountains, it has an atmosphere so pure that every breath is vital. It has beautiful ponds, flowing rivers, meadow brooks and bubbling springs, into some of which nature has dropped a few "drugs" for special invalids; so that for healthfulness it is unsurpassed. Its up-building force for debilitated ones is increasingly appreciated, and for the seekers of rest and quiet from the hard taxation of extended business, and for retirement from literary toils on the one hand, or on the other, for the prosecution of literary labor with every outside inspiration, the denizens of the cities are finding here in annual visits the fulness of the desirable qualities "restful" and "helpful."

The natural surroundings of Gilmanston are wonderfully beautiful. With its own high altitude it has mountain-peaks from whose summits the entire circle of the horizon seems one vast amphitheatre of grandeur and beauty. Mountains stand like mighty buttresses in endless variety of contour and elevation, and, far as the eye can see, wide valleys with cultured farms, hamlets and villages, dim woods and glistening streams and templed hills stretch away into a landscape that is indeed a "study" for the artist. An intelligent visitor (one of the most distinguished editors of our State) said recently, "As I ride in various directions from day to day, I am struck with the fact that while the views are ever changing and new vistas constantly opening, there is not a tame one among them."

Gilmanston again Territorially Diminished.—By an act of the Legislature, approved by His Excellency, Ichabod Goodwin, Governor, June 28, 1859, the town of Gilmanston parted company with many valuable and esteemed fellow-citizens, and with the "Upper Village" or "Factory Village," one of the three grand points of interest in the original town. They parted with many regrets on both sides. The historian of what is now "Belmont" can tell the story—while the writer hereof knows but little about it, having lived out of Gilmanston and out of New Hampshire nearly the whole of his professional life. He has never conversed, however, with any citizen in either town who did not deprecate the division. The result has proved advantageous to "Upper Gilmanston" (afterwards named "Belmont"), while the ancient and honorable Centre village, or "The Corner," finds itself on the corner quite too literally.

In the bill enacting the division it was stated that the first town-meeting in Gilmanston (diminished) should be called by a committee consisting of Moses Price, Cyrus Gilman and Isaac E. Smith, who, on the 13th of July, 1859, were duly sworn before Levi H. Mudgett, Esq., justice of the peace.

On the 14th of July this committee issued their

"warrant," calling the first town-meeting in Gilmanton at Academy Hall, on Saturday, the 6th day of August," prox., "at nine of the clock in the forenoon." Agreeably to the call, the legal voters of Gilmanton (diminished) assembled in town-meeting and chose John L. Kelley moderator, Levi W. Sanborn town clerk, and proceeded to fill all the required offices and appointments until the regular town-meeting in the following March.

Up to the time of the constitutional reconstruction the town had sent two representatives to the General Court; since that change, diminishing the House and enlarging the Senate, the town is allowed but one representative. The following is the list of representatives since the division of the town and incorporation of Belmont:

March 30, 1869, first March meeting, Cyrus Gilman and John K. Woodman were chosen representatives.

1885-86.—John Council.

Gilmanton in the War of the Rebellion.—The guns at Fort Sumter finally awoke startling echoes among these distant hills, and the children of patriot sires began to bestir themselves for the defense of their country. The Rebellion that had been widely spoken of as a mad uprising that "would soon shame itself to death," or "be crushed down in six months," was showing itself a more formidable outbreak than the wisest statesmen had apprehended at the beginning. The call had gone forth for men, strong and true, to turn from the peaceful fields of culture and the walks of industry to fields of battle. Gilmanton had strong men, for whom the bugle-blast was sounding, but, in such an unanticipated exigency, who should care for the loved ones left in the home?

At a legal town-meeting, by special warrant convened on the 11th of May, 1861 (John L. Kelley, moderator), David Hatch, Jonathan P. Hill, Thomas Cogswell, John K. Woodman, George W. Sanborn, Stephen Gale, Stephen L. Greeley, Samuel Parsons and Nahum Wight, were appointed a committee to consider a resolution submitted to the meeting by Jonathan P. Hill, as follows:

"Resolved, That the selectmen be authorized to hire, or on the behalf of the town such sum or sums of money as they may think proper, not exceeding one thousand dollars, to be expended for the benefit of the family or families of such persons or persons as may serve as volunteers in the State or United States' service from the town of Gilmanton, and to be left, at the discretion of the selectmen, to apply the same in such case or cases as they may think that humanity and the best good of our common country may require."

This was but the beginning of the contribution of money for the country's sake, and evidence of the little apprehension at the time of what the Rebellion would yet cost the people.

At a special meeting of the town, December 5, 1861 (Thomas Cogswell, Moderator), "Voted, that the chair appoint a committee of three to draft a resolution." The chair appointed John L. Kelley, John M. Durgin and Jonathan P. Hill, who reported a resolution similar to the foregoing, but setting the limit of provision at fifteen hundred dollars.

At the regular annual meeting, holden March 11, 1862 (George W. Sanborn, moderator), the following resolution presented by Hon. Thomas Cogswell passed:

"Resolved, That the legal voters of Gilmanton, in town-meeting assembled, do approve of President Lincoln's message of March 6th, and respectfully request our Senators and representatives in Congress to vote in favor of the resolution therein recommended by the President.

"And further, Resolved, That the town clerk send copies of the foregoing resolution to each of our delegation in Congress."

August 9, 1862, at a legal meeting called by petition of Thomas Cogswell and thirty-seven others (Henry W. Dudley, moderator), Thomas Cogswell presented the following resolution, which was passed:

"Whereas, The President of the United States has called for three hundred thousand men to enlist for three years, or during the war;

"Be it Resolved, by the legal voters of Gilmanton, in town-meeting assembled, that the selectmen of said town be authorized to pay to each able-bodied man, resident of said Gilmanton, who shall enlist and be mustered into the service of the United States for three years, or during war, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of two hundred dollars until October 1, 1862.

"And it is further Resolved, That the selectmen be authorized to hire, or, and on the credit of, said town of Gilmanton, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, to be applied as herein directed, or so much of said sum as may be needed."

By an order of the President of the United States August 4, 1862, the Governor of New Hampshire was required to furnish five thousand and fifty-three men to be drafted from the enrolled militia of the State for the term of nine months' service. Immediately the Governor authorized the selectmen of the towns to accept volunteers in lieu of drafted men; whereupon, at a legal town-meeting September 2, 1862 (Thomas Cogswell, moderator), the following resolution, by C. S. P. Sanderson, was adopted:

"Whereas, it is desirable to raise the quota of this town without resorting to a draft, the vote be it Resolved, etc., that the selectmen of the town of Gilmanton be authorized and instructed to pay to each able-bodied man, resident in said town, who may volunteer to take the place of those who might otherwise be drafted from said town and then be mustered into the military service of the United States for the term of nine months, unless sooner discharged, the sum of one hundred dollars when mustered into the United States' service, and when ordered out of the State the additional sum of one hundred dollars—pro-voted that the above sums shall not be paid to more than a sufficient number of men to complete the quota of the town.

"And be it further Resolved, That the selectmen be hereby authorized to hire on the credit of the town, the sum of ten thousand dollars, or such part of said sum as may be necessary for the purpose aforesaid."

At a legal meeting of the town on Saturday, October 3, 1863 (Jonathan P. Hill, moderator), a resolution was passed that,—

"Whereas, forty-five men of the enrolled militia of this town have been drafted under the conscription law.

"And Whereas the Legislature, at the late June session, authorized towns and cities to appropriate to drafted men or their substitutes the sum of three hundred dollars each, as a bounty, therefore Resolved, That the town of Gilmanston pay the sum aforesaid to each drafted man or substitute, or order, ten days after being mustered into the service of the United States. It was also further voted that the town hire the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, to be appropriated to this purpose so far as needed."

At a legal meeting of the town on Tuesday, December 1, 1863, on petition of Charles S. P. Sanderson and others (George W. Sanborn, moderator), Thomas Cogswell submitted a resolution in substance, that,—

"Whereas, on the 17th of October, 1863, the President of the United States issued a proclamation calling upon the Governors of the loyal States for 300,000 volunteers to serve in the army for three years, and if not raised voluntarily, must be raised by draft, after the 5th of January next, and Whereas the Government of the United States offer a bounty of four hundred and two dollars—to be paid in instalments—to veteran volunteers, and three hundred and two dollars to new recruits; and Whereas the Governor of New Hampshire has, by his Proclamation of 16 November, called on the cities and towns of the State to take immediate measures to raise their quota of men, and has offered a bounty of one hundred dollars to each volunteer in addition; the quota of Gilmanston at this time being twenty-one men. Now, therefore, be it Resolved, that the selectmen be and are hereby authorized to pay to each volunteer the whole amount offered by the general and State Governments, and further, that the selectmen are authorized to offer and to pay to each volunteer a yet additional sum, when mustered into the service of the United States, necessary to obtain said volunteers to fill the town's quota of twenty-one men. Also Resolved, that the selectmen hire, on the credit of the town, the sum of thirteen thousand dollars before the 5th day of January next, or so much as may be needed to the carrying out of this resolution."

At a called meeting of the town on the 20th of February, 1864 (Stephen L. Greeley, moderator), voted to pass resolutions presented by C. S. P. Sanderson. These were, first, "to pay each veteran soldier belonging to this town who has re-enlisted to make up the quota of this town under the recent call of the President of the United States for 'five hundred thousand more,' the sum of two hundred dollars. Also, that the town hire two thousand dollars, or what portion thereof may be needed." At a legal meeting of the town, March 29, 1864 (Stephen L. Greeley, moderator),—

"Resolved, to accept and adopt resolutions presented by Thomas Cogswell, in view of the call of the President for two hundred thousand men for three years, on the war, to wit: That the selectmen of the town of Gilmanston be authorized to pay to each citizen who shall volunteer, agreeably to the call of the President, till the town's quota be filled, the sum of two hundred dollars when mustered in. And, that the selectmen hire thirty-two hundred dollars to pay said volunteers."

August 13, 1864, at a legal town-meeting (George W. Sanborn, moderator), the following resolution was presented by Thomas Cogswell: That

"Whereas, the President of the United States called, on July 18, 1864, for five hundred thousand men, the town of Gilmanston will pay a bounty of three hundred dollars to each man who will volunteer for the term of three years to act as a substitute for any man subject to draft who may wish to put in a substitute in advance of impending or future drafts.

"Also the town will pay one hundred dollars, two hundred dollars and three hundred dollars, respectively, to each man who will volunteer for the terms of one year, two years and three years, respectively; to be credited on the quota of the town for the impending and future drafts.

"Also, the selectmen are authorized to hire thirty thousand dollars, by sale of town orders on the best terms, or such part of said sum as may be necessary for the above purposes."

At a legal town-meeting August 30, 1864 (George W. Sanborn, moderator), accepted and adopted a resolution by C. S. P. Sanderson,—

"That the town will pay to each drafted man at his muster in the sum of two hundred dollars in addition to the State bounty, and to each substitute who will take the place of the drafted, one hundred dollars for one year, two hundred dollars for two years and three hundred dollars for three years, respectively, in addition to the State bounty.

"Also that the selectmen be authorized to hire or raise, by the sale of town orders, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, or what may be needed for these payments."

At a legal meeting September 6, 1864 (George W. Sanborn, moderator), it was voted to adopt resolutions presented by Thomas Cogswell,—

"I. There shall be paid by town orders, to each citizen that has volunteered into the service of the United States, since the 30th day of last August up to this sixth day of September, instant, when fully mustered in and placed on this town's quota, under the last call of the President, five hundred dollars for one year's men, ten hundred dollars for two years' men and fifteen hundred dollars for three years' men, including what was voted on the 12th day of August last, to one, two and three years' men, who might volunteer to fill the quota of the town of Gilmanston.

"II. That the selectmen be authorized and directed to pay, by town orders, to each inhabitant of said town who shall volunteer for one year to fill the balance of said town's quota the sum of eight hundred dollars."

At this meeting it was voted also to accept and adopt a resolution by C. S. P. Sanderson "that the selectmen hire, on the credit of the town, the sum of forty thousand dollars, or such sum as may be necessary to carry the foregoing resolutions into effect." At this time the indications were that the war was near its end. It was so contended by Hon. Thomas Cogswell and others before the Assembly. Whether the town actually hired, after all that had been devoted, "the sum of forty thousand dollars" is best known to the men who were at that time its citizens; but it looks at this late day that if that was so, and if there were men who enlisted for three years when almost "the fight was done," with town bounty and State bounty and government bounty, they found a bonanza!

We who went to the front in the early days had no bounties. The fighting thousands in the field had soldiers' wages and hard struggle and hard-tack and were volunteers.

As with our towns generally, the war laid upon Gilmanston a heavy burden. But it is being nobly lifted, —taxes are every year less, while the debt is rapidly diminishing.

"The morning light is breaking."

According to the most accurate estimates of town officials, Gilmanton raised for war purposes about seventy-five thousand dollars. She furnished for the army more than two hundred men. Died, from the effects of war and lying within the town, forty.

Gilmanton Academy.—Judge Tourgee, in his "Fool's Errand," says, tersely and forcibly: "The remedy for darkness is light; for ignorance, knowledge; for wrong, righteousness. Educate the voter, because the nation cannot afford that he should be ignorant." President Hayes said, in a speech in Canton, Ohio: "Ignorant voters are powder and balls for the demagogue." The New England fathers believed devoutly in great truths for the popular weal, which are accepted to-day and are a power for good. They saw that, especially in republics, popular ignorance is popular peril. But they saw, still further, that education must be more than simply of the intellect. Science is not virtue. There must be the pervasive influence of that religion which sanctifies the power of knowledge, and teaches the freeman what is true liberty; which puts the eternal Potentate on the throne, and writes His Law on the great popular heart.

In the settlement of New England towns the fathers gave these matters early attention. After the pattern of the Pilgrims landing on the bleak coast of Plymouth, "they built a shelter for their heads with rapid industry, then built a house for God, and built the school-house beneath its shadow." They put the Bible there, with the intent that it should stay there. The founders of Gilmanton took early measures to provide for the education of the young. In the seventh year of the settlement, 1769, they voted to hire a teacher eight months the ensuing year, and to build two school-houses. The following year, 1770, they voted a tax of twenty pounds for the schools. In the time of the Revolutionary War Rev. Mr. Parsons was paid three hundred and eighty-nine pounds and Dr. William Smith ninety pounds for teaching schools. After the war Eliphalet Wood was a celebrated teacher, and opened a private school near "Smith Meeting-House," which was quite largely attended. Afterwards Rev. Samuel Hidden (Father Hidden) taught with great celebrity; and at a later period Dudley Leavitt taught with success and honors.

Soon the districts employed and paid their own teachers, and their transactions ceased to be matters of town record.

There were now many leading citizens who desired the establishment of an institution of higher order and broader reach than the common schools. After due consultation, a petition was presented, and Gilmanton Academy was incorporated by the Legislature in 1794.

A commodious building was rapidly pushed forward, and the school opened under the instruction of Peter L. Folsom, A.B., a graduate from Dartmouth College, who continued as principal during the following six years. At the opening of the school a sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Smith. From that date to the present the school has lived, while many kindred institutions have passed away. It has never lost a term in the ninety-one years. What is on record of its early history must be gathered from the careful chronicles of Rev. Mr. Lancaster; for in an unfortunate fire on the night of September 25, 1872, all the records, with the miscellaneous papers, were burned. The records had been carefully kept by Stephen L. Greeley, Esq., who held the office of secretary of the board of trustees for fifty successive years.

In 1796 a fund had been raised of five thousand five hundred dollars. On October 1, 1799, Stephen Moody, Esq., was elected to the board and to the office of treasurer, which office he held for thirty-five years.

Matters went on very pleasantly and prosperously till, in 1808, a sad trial came, through the entire destruction of the academy building by fire, on the night of the 22d of January, and through the careless deposit of ashes in a barrel. But the fathers were men of might and indomitable purpose. On the 24th of February, just four weeks and four days after the fire, the frame of the present building was erected. The town voted to contribute two hundred and fifty dollars toward completing the building, and the trustees granted the future right to hold in the hall its meetings for town business.

As Gilmanton Academy is one of the three academies first founded in the State, so it has maintained its integrity through all vicissitudes. Its children are a multitude, widely scattered abroad, and it is here suggested that many of them, who have attained not only to fame but to fortune, would remember their Alma Mater with some generous donations. She is now venerable for age and good works. Her "how abides in strength," but she greatly needs pecuniary aid, in order to enlarge her usefulness.

Through the opportune publication of the town history by Rev. Mr. Lancaster, the names are preserved of all who had care of this institution from the beginning,—men who were zealous for popular education, and, so far as citizens of Gilmanton, men who did much for the prosperity and honor of the town. The reading of the roll awakens emotions of gratitude and of sadness. Not one of these men is to-day among the living.

"Man being in honor, continue he not,"

but, departing late or early,

"The good man cannot die before his time,
The Lord's appointment is the servant's hour."

Beginning with names of the first curators, appointed at the issuing of the charter, in 1794, they stand as follows: Hon. Joseph Badger, Rev. Isaac Smith, A.M., Rev. Joseph Woolman, A.M., Rev. Josiah Tucker, A.M., Rev. Simon Finley Williams, A.M., Hon. Joseph Badger, Jr., Samuel Greeley, Esq., Hon. Ebenezer Smith, Hon. Thomas Cogswell, Joseph Parsons, Esq., Stephen Moody, Esq., Enoch Wood, Esq., His Excellency William Badger, John Ham, A.M., Thomas Burnis, Esq., Daniel Smith, Esq., Peter L. Folsom, A.M., Rev. Abraham Bolwell, A.M., Rev. William Patrick, A.M., Rev. Luke Ainsworth Spofford, A.M., Rev. Enoch Corser, A.M., Stephen Leavitt Greeley, Esq., Francis Cogswell, Esq., A.M., Jeremiah Wilson, Esq., Rev. Heman Root, A.M., Rev. Daniel Lancaster, A.M., Andrew Mack, A.M., Rev. Nathaniel Bouton, D.D., Rev. Nathan Lord, D.D., Stephen C. Lyford, A.M., Rev. Jonathan Clement, A.M., Hon. Thomas Cogswell, Jonathan Clarke, Esq., Rev. William Cogswell, D.D., Nahum White, M.D., Hon. Ira A. Eastman, A.M., Rev. John K. Young, A.M., Hon. William C. Clarke, A.M., Asa McFarland, A.M., Rev. Joseph Blake, D.D. With the one exception of Rev. Joseph Blake, all the foregoing have passed away.

At this present time (July, 1885), the official board is as follows: Trustees,—Colonel Thomas Cogswell, A.M., president and treasurer; Rev. S. S. N. Greeley, secretary; Colonel Joseph Badger, A.M., Rev. Moses T. Runnels, A.M., William Pitt Eastman, Esq., John B. B. Batchelder, Esq., Stephen H. Dearborn, Daniel S. Ayer, Stephen G. Clarke, Esq. Instructors,—Samuel W. Robertson, A.B., teacher of Latin, Greek and natural science; Mrs. Grace K. Robertson, teacher of mathematics and English; Mrs. Emma P. Dearborn, teacher of music (instrumental and vocal); James W. McMurphy, librarian; William M. Dearborn, librarian in long summer vacation.

Some notice may be proper here of trustees of the academy who, living for years in the town, and having more immediate care of the institution, have deceased since the issue of any town history.

EX-GOVERNOR WILLIAM BADGER. (See Belmont.)

JEREMIAH WILSON, Esq.—Thomas Wilson came to this country from Scotland in 1633. He was admitted a freeman in Massachusetts in 1634. He soon removed beyond the limits of Massachusetts, and was one of a party that left Boston on account of the Arminian controversy, and began a plantation at Squamset Falls, which they called Exeter. In 1638 they combined into a separate body politic, which has been known as the "Wheelright Compact," so called from John Wheelright, a preacher at Braintree (then a part of Boston), a man of piety, learning and zeal. This combination lasted three years. Their laws were made in a popular Assembly, and formally assented to by the rulers, who were Isaac Grosse, Nicholas Needham and Thomas Wilson.

He had a son, Humphrey Wilson, who had a son, Thomas Wilson, born May 30, 1677, and married Mary Light, October 16, 1698. He was one of the original proprietors of Gilmanton. They also had a son Humphrey, who was born December 9, 1699; married Mary Leavitt. He was an original proprietor. Captain Nathaniel Wilson was their son, born June 24, 1739; married Elizabeth Barber, March 15, 1762. He came to Gilmanton from Epping in March, 1769, and settled on what has since been well known as "Wilson Hill." He was one of the original five members organized into the "First Congregational Church," November 30, 1774, that worshiped so many years in the "Old Smith Meeting-House," under the pastor they settled, the Rev. Isaac Smith. He was one of the selectmen in 1770, and one of a "Committee of Safety" chosen by the town in 1777. He was commander of a company of thirty-five men called into military service from Gilmanton and vicinity. They joined Colonel Thomas Stickney's regiment of General John Stark's brigade, in defense of the western frontier from the ravages of Burgoyne's army. They fell in with the enemy August 15th, at Bennington, and occupied the right wing in that well-fought battle, which turned the fortunes of the British commander, and led the way to the speedy surrender of his whole army to the American forces. This service won great honor for the town. They were out two months and one day. Captain Wilson was a good farmer and mechanic, an energetic and industrious man, a very worthy citizen and an exemplary Christian.

Jeremiah Wilson, son of Captain Nathaniel Wilson and Elizabeth Barber, was the youngest of nine sons. He was born October 14, 1781; married Abigail Prescott Sanborn, daughter of Deacon Abraham Sanborn, May 23, 1803. He succeeded his father in possession of the Wilson farm, which he much improved and enlarged by purchase. He obtained, mostly by his own exertions, a good common school education; engaged early in trade, which he pursued about thirty years, at the same time conducting agricultural operations rather extensively. In the later years of his life he turned his attention to the mountain lands in the north part of Gilmanton and adjoining towns, of which he purchased several thousand acres, cleared up extensively from the original forests, and valuable for grazing.

He was for several years one of the selectmen; five sessions he was a member of the Legislature, and for many years the candidate of his party for councilor. He was a leading citizen, watchful of the public interests, much engaged in business for others, active and energetic to accomplish whatever he undertook. He was a zealous supporter of public worship and a promoter of reforms. He was esteemed for integrity of character and a sound judgment. At the annual meeting in 1827 he was elected to the board of trustees of Gilmanton Academy. He was an earnest friend of education for the people and desirous that facilities for broader culture than he had himself enjoyed should be zealously maintained and perpetuated. After the lapse of ten years, with pressing cares upon him, he tendered his resignation, in 1837. He died suddenly and alone in his pasture at the mountains, supposed of apoplexy, August 15, 1846. His wife died June 12, 1854. They left no children.

Thomas Cogswell

HON. THOMAS COGSWELL, SR.—In the artistic, interesting and instructive volume issued by Colonel John B. Clarke (Manchester, 1882), "Sketches of Successful New Hampshire Men," there is a finely-drawn portraiture of the subject of this notice,—so truthful, just and worthy of a good and honored man, that nothing better can be done than to crave permission to transfer that article largely to this new volume.

The town of Gilmanton, says this anonymous writer, has always been distinguished for its strong and able men, who have exercised a powerful influence in the affairs of their town and State. It has furnished men to fill nearly every position of trust and honor within the gift of the people of our State; and it has ever been proud of its illustrious sons. Among the very strong men of this old town stood Hon. Thomas Cogswell, who, in the year 1820, at the age of twenty-one, moved hither from Atkinson, N. H., where he was born December 7, 1798. He was one of a family of nine children of William and Judith (Badger) Cogswell, eight of whom lived to years of maturity. He settled on the farm formerly occupied by his grandfather, the Hon. Joseph Badger, and, with strong hands and indomitable courage, commenced gaining a livelihood for himself and young wife, Mary Noyes, whom he married just before moving here.

Among the older settlers he soon became a leading man of the town, and ever afterward took an active part in all its local affairs, and for the whole period of his life was honored and respected by his neighbors and townsmen, and received at their hands every office in their gift. There is no position that more truly shows the strength and power of a man than that of moderator of a New Hampshire town-meeting; but for many successive years he was chosen to preside over the deliberations of the annual and other meetings of this then large town; and always did so with great dignity, and to the perfect satisfaction of all. He was also chosen one of the Board of Selectmen, and represented the town in the Legislature, and while a member of that body introduced and supported a bill to repeal the law authorizing imprisonment for debt. For ten years he was a deputy sheriff of the old county of Strafford, and during all this time was actively engaged in the duties of the office. For years he was county treasurer. In 1841 he was appointed one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas for the new county of Belknap, and held that position till the change in the judiciary system of the State, in 1855. In 1856 he was elected a member of the Governor's Council from District Number Three. For over forty years he was a justice of the peace. He was an officer in the New Hampshire militia, and attained the rank of captain. He was of Revolutionary stock, his father and seven uncles having served in that war, and performed, in the aggregate, thirty-eight years of service.

For seven years in succession he taught the winter school of his district, and attended to all the affairs of his farm in their season. During his whole life he was interested in and a promoter of education. Gilmanton Academy, established by the efforts of his grandfather, General Joseph Badger, and his uncle, Hon. Thos. Cogswell, with the assistance of other strong and good men, early received his aid and co-operation, and he was one of its board of trustees twenty-eight years (1840-68).

Notwithstanding the burdens of almost continuous public service for so many years, Mr. Cogswell was a large and successful farmer, adding year after year by his own exertions to his original farm, so that at his death he owned in one tract nearly one thousand acres of valuable land,—“Does farming pay?” Mr. Cogswell loved the soil, studied its cultivation by the best methods, loved agriculture as a science and a great art, to be prosecuted not only diligently, but intelligently,—the foundation of the wealth and prosperity of the whole country,—and so with him, “Farming paid.”

In early life he became a member of the Congregational Church at Gilmanton Iron-Works, and was deacon of the same from March 1, 1839, through many years of active service and usefulness. He always gave freely of his means for the advancement of the cause of the Christian religion.

He possessed to an uncommon degree strong natural powers of mind, and was capable of grasping difficult questions and giving a good legal opinion. His mind was essentially judicial, and, had he devoted himself to the study and practice of law, would undoubtedly have been a leading mind in that profession. For many years he was consulted by his neighbors and townsmen upon the troubles that frequently rose between them, and, to his credit, by his clear and practical judgment saved, frequently, long and expensive litigation. He was true to every trust committed to him, and was scrupulously honest and exact in all his dealings.

In politics, Thomas Cogswell was a Democrat to the end of his life. During the War of the Rebellion he was a strong supporter of the government, and a friend and well-wisher of every soldier in the field.

He saw clearly and plainly that his duty as an American citizen was to render all the aid in his power to help carry on and bring to a successful close the terrible struggle then going on. He was a lover of his country, and delighted in its free institutions, and, though strong in his political convictions, was never a partisan.

Mr. Cogswell was noted for his energy and force of character, and when he once made up his mind as to a certain course to pursue, he never changed it until he was thoroughly satisfied that he was wrong. He was a natural leader among men, and possessed the characteristics of a great general.

He was a ready and fluent public speaker, and few torate for five years. In 1860 he, with his family, removed to New York City, which was his home until his death. He did not assume the further cares of any "parish," but preaching frequently and most acceptably till about ten years before he retired from public labor. About this time he had the sad affliction of the failure of sight, which gradually increased almost to blindness. In an obituary notice in the New York Evening Post, by Greenleaf Clarke, Esq., speaking of this and of the recent dead, he says,—

"He bore this hardship like all other trials in life—with a degree of cheerful Christian resignation which is rarely witnessed. His kindness of heart was unfeeling; and while rigorous in his sense of duty, he was always tolerant of all minor failings in others. Of dignified bearing, and in appearance the type of an old-school clergyman, he was without a tinge of austerity, and possessed a vein of quiet humor that gave a charm to his conversation. To the last he preserved a youthful freshness of mind and an interest in all passing events that are unusual in a man of his advanced years and retired habits."

Rev. Lyman Abbott, of the New York Christian Union, said of him,—

"I had an active acquaintance with Mr. Lancaster for about three years previous to his,—death an acquaintance which, on my part, was one of tolerant affection and esteem. The garrulity of old soldiers is proverbial. Mr. Lancaster was an exception to the proverb. He was already an old man then, retired without a pension from the army in which he had served faithfully and long. He was then seventy years of age. But, intimately as I knew him, it was not till after his death that I learned from others the brief story of his life and the positions of honor and influence he had occupied."

Mr. Lancaster, to the close of life, maintained the warmest interest and love for the college from which he was graduated, and in the autumn of 1863 he formed the idea that its welfare might be advanced by the formation of an Alumni Association in New York City. By personally visiting many of the graduates of Dartmouth, and expending much time and labor, he succeeded in inspiring them with his own enthusiasm in the project, and the result was the speedy formation of the Dartmouth College Alumni Association,—the pioneer of all the organizations of the kind in the city of New York. Until the last three years of life Mr. Lancaster attended regularly the annual dinners of the association as an honored guest. He was the last survivor of the Dartmouth class of 1821.

Mr. Lancaster was twice married,—the first wife, Anne E. Lemist, daughter of John Lemist, of Dorchester, Mass.; he married August 29, 1827; she died August 27, 1829, aged twenty-eight years. He married, in Gilmanton, Eliza Gibbs Greeley, daughter of Daniel Greeley, Esq., of Foxcroft, Me., February 14, 1831. There were five children, two only of whom survive, and, with the mother, are highly esteemed and useful citizens in the great metropolis to-day. Rev. Mr. Lancaster died May 28, 1880.

HON. ISA ALLEN EASTMAN, son of Stephen and grandson of Lieutenant Ebenezer Eastman, was born in Gilmanton January 1, 1809; fitted for college principally at Gilmanton Academy, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1829. He read law in Troy and Albany, N. Y., and was admitted in the city of New York to the Supreme Court and Court of Chancery in May 1832. He commenced practice in Troy, and was married to Jane, daughter of John N. Quackenbush, Esq., of Albany, February 20, 1833. He returned to Gilmanton in the spring of 1834, and began his official career as clerk of the State Senate in 1835; he represented Gilmanton in the Legislature in 1836, 1837 and 1838, filling the Speaker's chair during the two latter years. He was register of Probate for Strafford County from 1836 to 1839, when (1839) he was elected to Congress for two years, and re-elected in March, 1841, for two years more, and, September 26, 1844, was appointed circuit judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the State of New Hampshire, which office he held until 1859. In 1863 he was the Democratic candidate for Governor, making a remarkable run and very narrowly escaping election. In 1851 he was elected a trustee of Gilmanton Academy, and from 1875 to 1879 was president of the board. In 1857 he was chosen a trustee of Dartmouth College, a position he held to the time of his death.

He ever retained a deep interest in his native town and the academy, and was seldom absent at the meetings of its trustees, and equally so after he had removed from the town and built his pleasant home in Manchester.

His death was after a very brief illness, and an obituary in one of the city papers said: "In the death of Hon. Ira A. Eastman the State has lost one of its most widely-known and honored citizens. Retiring from many years of public service, discharged with diligence for the past ten years, he has found sufficient employment in the management of his private affairs. He died at his home in Manchester March 21, 1881."

REV. HEMAN ROOD, D.D., was born in Jericho, Vt., January 29, 1795. He was one of eleven children of Thomas D. and Sarah (Bradley) Rood. His grandfather came from Scotland and settled in Lanesborough, Mass., about the year 1730, where he lived until his removal to Jericho, some five or six years before the Revolutionary War. He was the first Christian, and his the third family that settled in that town. Having received a thorough common-school education, at the age of fifteen Heman Rood commenced teaching. In the spring of 1814 he began fitting for college at Shoreham Academy. At twenty years of age he entered Middlebury College, graduating in 1819. Subsequently he was for two years principal of Montpelier Academy, and was then appointed for one year tutor at Middlebury. In 1822 he entered the Theological Seminary at Andover. Completing the three years' course, he was licensed to preach by the Suffolk Association June, 1825. While in the seminary he received an invitation to preach at Gilmanton (N. H.) Centre village. Hitherto the people of that section had worshiped at "the Old Smith Meeting-House," three miles distant, and with the original "First Congregational Church" of the fathers. Mr. Rood commenced his labors at the Academy or Centre village, Sabbath, October 22, 1825. A church was soon formed and a house of worship erected. He was ordained and installed over this new church July 12, 1826. Dr. Justin Edwards preached the sermon from 1st Timothy iii. 15: "That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God," etc. During the ministry of Mr. Rood, of about four and a half years, there was one very interesting time of revival, in which over twenty prominent citizens were brought into the church. Receiving an unexpected call from New Milford, Conn., he was dismissed from his first pastorate March 3, 1830, and installed over the Congregational Church in New Milford April 21, 1830. In later life he considered that his most important work was performed at this place. In the spring and summer of 1832 there was a very general religious interest in the town resulting in the addition to the church of one hundred and twenty persons, ninety-nine of whom were received together, on the first Sabbath of 1833. On July 28, 1835, he was dismissed from this pastorate, and on September 9th accepted the appointment of professor of Hebrew and Biblical Literature in a new Theological Seminary at Gilmanton, N. H., the field of his first public labors. He held that position a little more than eight years, when, on account of the general moneyed stringency and the decrease of students, he and Professor Aaron Warner tendered their resignations, November 22, 1843. The three following years he was principal of a High School in Haverhill, N. H., and was afterwards for five years acting pastor at Quebec, Vt., and for six following years at Hartland, Vt. At the age of seventy he gave up his regular work in the ministry and removed to Hanover, N. H., and there engaged in a private study of the Bible. As a result of that study, several interesting articles have appeared in religious periodicals. It has been understood also that he was preparing a critical and labored commentary on the Psalms. Mr. Rood married Frances Susan Moody, daughter of Stephen Moody, Esq., of Gilmanton, November 29, 1827. A few years ago Middlebury College gave him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. He spent his last few years with his children, and after a gradual coming down to the close of life and labors—strong in faith and joyously confident in the truths he had preached for many years—at the home of a daughter in Westfield, N. Y., he died June 8, 1882. His remains were brought to Hanover and interred beside his wife, who had preceded him some seven years to "the better country."

XAHUM WIGHT, M. D., died at his home in Gilmanton on May 12, 1884. Born in Gibbad, Me., November 29, 1807; the eldest of a family of fifteen children; acquired his education mainly by his own efforts; placed himself for medical instruction under the charge of Dr. John Grover, of Bethel, Me., father of United States Senator Grover, of Oregon, the latter being for a time a pupil of Dr. Wight; graduated from the medical school at Bowdoin College in the spring of 1832 and in November of the same year settled at the Academy village, in Gilmanton, succeeding Dr. William Prescott, a man distinguished as a medical man and scientist. His competitors, when he entered this field, were Dr. Dixie Crosby and Dr. John C. Page. After a few years Dr. Crosby was called to a professorship at the Dartmouth Medical College, and Dr. Page entered the ministry, leaving to Dr. Wight the entire practice without competition.

Gilmanton village, though small, was at this time, in many respects, important. It was the business centre of a large and thrifty farming community in a town of nearly four thousand inhabitants. Here the highest court in New Hampshire held its stated sessions; here, also, was one of the oldest and most flourishing academies in the State; and here was the seat of a theological seminary, conducted by professors eminent for learning and piety. The society of the place was noted for morality, intelligence and refinement. Into such a community the young physician entered, and rapidly won respect, confidence and patronage.

Dr. Wight began early to take charge of medical students, and did so till near the close of his life. More than forty young men were under his direction during the whole or a part of their course of professional study. For several years he maintained a dissecting-room, from which some dry preparations are still preserved, that for perfection of execution are not surpassed in any medical museum.

Dr. Wight continued earnest in his extending practice and in teaching, studios and growing in knowledge and reputation, till, in 1846, he determined to go abroad for medical improvement. He was in Europe nearly twelve months, visiting the medical centres, studying and observing. He made the utmost of his opportunities. Having gained much practical knowledge and obtained a supply of excellent instruments, he returned to his professional work with renewed zeal. His letters from abroad were much enjoyed by such a scholar as the late Professor E. R. Peaslee, and his lectures after his return were received with great favor. This foreign travel and study from the savings of a moderate income was quite a bold undertaking for a country doctor forty years ago. Dr. Wight attained eminence in his profession. His practice was distinguished for definiteness in diagnosis, in which he early began to excel. His faith in the use of drugs was reasonable, but limited. He was a good surgeon, often called by other physicians for consultation and operations; and by medical brethren and the people, in a wide field, his medical services and opinions were held in high estimation. Many difficult surgical operations were performed by him successfully. He loved the profession of his choice and strove to elevate it. Having been for many years a member of the Centre District Medical Society, in 1839 he was received a Fellow of the State organization. He took occasional part in its discussions, read papers before it and in 1874 was elected its president.

It has been a remarkable and unusual life,—fifty-two years of medical practice in one town, by night and day, in heat and cold, in sunshine and storm, in strength and in weariness.

In the civil and educational affairs of the town Dr. Wight has been called to fill important and honorable positions. In three successive years—1841, '42, '43—he was representative. In 1851 he was elected a trustee of the academy and held the office till his death,—thirty-three years. November 10, 1870, he was elected treasurer, which office he held nearly fourteen years.

Dr. Wight, though not in membership, was a warm and generous friend of the Congregational Church and a constant attendant on public worship, so far as professional services made it possible.

Dr. Wight was married, September 3, 1833, to Mary Ann Straw, daughter of Lieutenant Gideon Straw, a widely-known citizen of Newfield, Me. She was an excellent woman, wife and mother. Neither ostentatious nor spasmodic, the sincerity of her piety shone in her daily life.

Dr. Wight survived his wife and five of his eight children. It was his fate to meet with much affliction.

His first-born, a son who much resembled his father, and in whom his ambition and dearest hopes centred, with trunk packed for the journey to enter college, suddenly sickened and died. The father's grief at this loss was terrible. Its dark shadow rested on all his after life. He performed two surgical operations, of a severe and hazardous character, upon his wife, by her requirement. The writer was called once to assist. An anæsthetic made the patient calm and comfortable—the surgeon suffered. The operation was well performed, and death was averted several years.

On the fiftieth anniversary of his coming to Gilmanton a large number of his friends gathered at his home and commemorated the event in an impressive and happy manner. A few weeks after this occasion he was warned suddenly by a mild apoplectic attack. From this he nearly recovered, till about two weeks before his death, when he was found in bed helpless, with signs of cerebral hemorrhage. Although he rallied for a little time, he gradually sank, and calmly passed away. At his funeral the church was filled by neighbors, patrons, physicians, clergymen and representatives of the bar and bench, many of whom came from a distance, all friends of the good old physician. The religious services were conducted by the pastor, Rev. S. S. N. Greeley, who uttered an eloquent and tender eulogy on the pleasant acquaintance of his early life and the intimate friend of recent years. The remains were borne to the village cemetery, beautiful by nature. Physicians and chosen friends sadly and thoughtfully, with careful hands, lowered to his last resting-place all that was mortal of Nahum Wight. For more than half a century he honored our profession, and was a benefactor to his race.

Gilmanton Theological Seminary.—Some mention should be made of this institution, though its brief but useful history is widely known. It was contemplated by the fathers, and provided for by the terms of the original charter of Gilmanton Academy (as Andover Seminary rests back to-day on the charter of Phillips Academy), and after many years a theological class was received. There were circumstances that led good men to believe that the time had at length come to open a department of theology. After the great revivals of religion in the years 1832-33 there was an unusual call for preachers, especially for home missionary parishes and the sparse settlements of Northern New England, and the existing seminaries were unable to supply the demand. In the State of New Hampshire alone there were more than a hundred towns without any Congregational minister, and over fifty Congregational Churches without a pastor.

At the same time, as another consequence of these revivals, there was quite a large class of men, partly educated, who earnestly desired to study for the ministry without a previous college course, on account of their age or pecuniary inability, but men who, by practical knowledge of the world, by energy, physical strength and talents, were admirably adapted for these waiting fields. There were, however, even at the first, several graduates of colleges who studied at Gilmanton with much pleasure and profit; and it is worthy of note that in late years the theological seminaries at Andover and Chicago have made separate provision, by the endowments of professorships and special courses of instruction for just this class of men for whom the seminary at Gilmanton was first opened.

It was on August 15, 1835, at their annual meeting, having been maturing plans for two years, that the trustees of Gilmanton Academy called the Rev. Heiman Root, from New Milford, Conn., to open and conduct a department of theology. He accepted the appointment and was inaugurated professor of theology and Biblical literature on the 9th of September. The seminary commenced operations the following month, October, 1835. The course of instruction began with seven students.

Very soon, by the advice of men in whom the board had confidence (says the historian of Gilmanton, p. 170), both in New Hampshire and in Massachusetts, the plan of the department was enlarged so as to include a more complete course of training for the ministry, and Rev. Aaron Warner, D.D., was appointed professor of sacred rhetoric. He was inaugurated on the first anniversary, August 25, 1836. There has been printed for the family and personal friends a very interesting life-sketch of Professor Warner, by Professor Crowell, of Amherst College (a son-in-law), in which, speaking of this appointment, he says: "Professor Warner was in full sympathy with the object for which the seminary was established. During the seven years and a half of his connection with it he untiringly devoted all his energies to its interests, and especially to the work of his own department,—the training of students in the art of pulpit discourse,—and, according to the testimony of competent observers, and particularly of his pupils, with a large measure of success." Says his colleague, Rev. Herman Rood, D.D.: "Professor Warner was very useful and popular as a teacher in the seminary. The classes were well and thoroughly trained in his department. They learned to write correctly and to speak and preach impressively. He once afterwards said to me that he regarded the years spent in the seminary as the happiest and most useful years of his life." After closing these years of usefulness Professor Warner was appointed to the chair of rhetoric, oratory and English literature in Amherst College, upon the duties of which he entered in January, 1845. The college at that time was in circumstances that necessitated the performance of labor sufficient for three men.

It gradually undermined his strength, and a weakness of the eyes, which had long been a trial to him, increased almost to blindness, so that he resigned his severe toils in the autumn of 1853, having held his professorship through a term equaled at that date by only three out of seven instructors who had preceded him in that position. Professor Warner continued to reside in Amherst the years that were left him, till, in the full assurance of hope, he died May 14, 1876, in the middle of his eighty-second year.

In September, 1839, the institution, that had now taken on the form and offices of a distinct theological seminary, was increased in facilities by the call to a professorship of the Rev. Isaac Bird, late of the Syrian Mission of the A. B. C. F. M. Mr. Bird was admitted to be one of the finest linguists in his day, among the entire regiment of the board's missionaries. Lancaster ("History," p. 224) says of him: "He sailed as a missionary to Syria in December, 1822; resided at Beyroot the greater part of ten years, besides short residences in different villages in Mount Lebanon, at Jernsalem, Malta and Smyrna, four years more. He was in the constant conversational use of the Italian and Arabic languages for twelve years, and acquired a ready reading knowledge of the Syriac, French, Spanish and German, besides some acquaintance with the Turkish and Persian. He returned to this country at the close of 1836, and was an instructor at Gilmanton in the department of theology from September, 1839, to December, 1843, and from that time was instructor in sacred literature, to which department he was elected professor July 9, 1844, and was inaugurated on the 14th of the same month."

In 1838, Dr. Dixie Crosby was appointed lecturer on anatomy, physiology and health, succeeded by Dr. Nahum Wight in 1844.

On the 23d of April, 1839, the ground was broken for the erection of a new building for the use of the seminary, of brick, eighty-eight feet long, fifty feet wide and three stories high above the basement. The plan of this building was drawn by Ami B. Young, Esq., architect of the custom-house in Boston, and was one of the most admirably adapted to the purposes intended of any college or seminary hall then known in the country. In November of 1839 the walls were up and covered by a roof. "Its location," says Professor Crowell ("Memorial of Professor Warner," p. 40), "is on an elevation commanding a beautiful prospect, secured in 1837, and money to defray the cost of its erection gradually obtained, and on August 18, 1841, the completed building was dedicated with public services, Professor Warner delivering the dedicatory address."

At this time there had been donated by a multitude of friends and publishers in Boston, and more largely in New York, a library of nearly four thousand volumes. With its able teachers, the seminary greatly prospered, and visiting clergymen and friends from far and near gave their testimony that they found everything about it and pertaining to it on a vastly higher plane than they had anticipated.

Within three years from the first anniversary twenty-two of its graduates were settled in the pastorates of churches, most of them in New Hampshire, and for the first seven years the number of graduates averaged, yearly, ten. Each man was spoken for before his term of study was completed. To meet the current expenses of the institution, it was obliged to rely chiefly on yearly donations. The embarrassed state of mercantile affairs throughout the country in the years 1841 and 1842 prevented the continuance of these gifts, and caused such a pressure in the financial condition of the seminary that by the next year the support of the professors almost entirely failed, and there seemed to be no alternative but withdrawal. Accordingly, on the 22d of November, 1843, Professor Warner and Professor Rood both resigned.

At the same date Rev. William Cogswell, D.D., professor of history and national education in Dartmouth College, was appointed president and professor of Christian theology in the seminary. There is little need to speak him particularly here, as he was a man of national reputation. The appointment, and his coming at this time of trial, simply show how highly the seminary was prized by scholars and public officials in the Christian Church, and their readiness to sacrifice, if in any way possible, to save it. Dr. Cogswell accepted the office January 11, 1844, entered at once on its duties and was inaugurated February 7th the same year. At the same time Mr. Charles Tenney, a very popular principal of the academy (Dartmouth, 1835), was ordained an evangelist, and was appointed instructor of sacred rhetoric in the seminary. By new special gifts from benevolent friends, and by severe sacrifices from residents in the village, the seminary struggled on till the census shows over fifty men that passed through and out of it, publicly to toil in the world's great field of whitened harvest. At this date quite a large number of them have ceased from their labors, having heard a voice saying, "Come up higher;" others are enfeebled through age and toil, and others growing old are yet young, and working "while the day lasts." One of the number, nigh upon the period that is reached only "by reason of strength," several years ago received "extreme unction" in a doctorate of divinity, and still lives, while the rest have been enabled to dodge it hitherto.

Under all the difficulties and discouragements Dr. Cogswell struggled manfully to sustain the institution, but not only was there stringency in pecuniary matters all abroad, but the young men were few who turned their thoughts toward the ministry. Of course, then the regular routine of the past had to be suspended; but the trustees offered the free use of rooms and furniture in the building, use of the library and what of instruction they might obtain to any and all students who would like to repair to the seminary for a season.

The great hall is the property of the academy, and is used for summer boarders in the long vacation, and by students of the academy in term-time.

The Churches.—The churches of Gilmanton, like the population of the town, have decreased in membership and pecuniary ability. The fathers and the mothers in Israel are mostly numbered with the dead, while the warm young blood of the children flows in the life of churches in the larger towns and cities. It is so all abroad through our New Hampshire. And yet, worthy of all honor and needed help are these little churches scattered over the hills and valleys. They have impoverished themselves by giving to others. They have not much ability to "go down to the battle," but they are "sticking by the stuff;" they are holding back the tide of iniquity, and are shedding quietly and beautifully that hallowed light without which large sections of our State would be speedily in moral darkness.

Since the publication of Lancaster's "History of Gilmanton," the old First Church at the "Smith Meeting-House" has become virtually extinct, and for several years has not been reported in the minutes of the General Association.

According to Rev. Mr. Lancaster ("History," page 192), its first pastor, Rev. Isaac Smith, preached forty-three years, and, after a short illness, died among his people, March 25, 1817, in the seventy-third year of his age. He was succeeded by Rev. Luke Ainsworth Spofford, who was ordained on June 9, 1819. His pastorate was about six years, during which time thirty were added to the church. On account of insufficient health for so large a field of labor, he asked release, and was dismissed on the 9th of June, 1825.

On the 21st September, 1825, the Rev. Daniel Lancaster was settled, having received two calls from the church.

On the 26th February, 1826, letters of dismission and recommendation were voted to twenty-five members of the church to form a new church at the Centre village (Academy), and on the 12th October, 1830, thirteen individuals were dismissed to form a church at Gilmanton Iron-Works.

These two special periods of emigration diminished the church by thirty-eight members. On the other hand, there were two special revival seasons, in the winter of 1846-47 and in 1831, which brought into the church seventy-five new members. Thus the number was more than restored, but the pecuniary ability of the church was not restored, and on July 25, 1832, Rev. Mr. Lancaster was dismissed for want of support. During his ministry of six years eighty-five were added to the church; there were one hundred and eighteen baptisms and over one hundred burials of the dead.

After this removal of their pastor the church secured supplies as they had opportunity, till, in 1834, they had the Rev. Francis P. Smith, son of the first minister, as acting pastor through the entire year. A revival season was enjoyed during this year, and twenty were added to the church. At the close of Mr. Smith's engagement the Rev. Josiah Carpenter was secured for a year, under whose ministry twelve were added to the church. Subsequently students from the seminary preached as Sabbath supplies, till Mr. Horace Wood, a licensed graduate, engaged with them for a considerable period; but in the recent years there has been in the meeting-house no regular service. Occasionally neighboring pastors preach an afternoon or evening sermon; otherwise the house is closed, and silence reigns. The families surrounding have greatly changed. Some have become extinct, others removed, and others, who in these days go to church anywhere, go to the village, or to the Iron-Works or to the church at Lower Gilmanton; and yet, there is the spirit of beauty and of sacredness lingering about the old spot. Near at hand is the burying-ground, "where the forefathers of the hamlet sleep," and numbers of the patriot dead are gathered here, whose graves are decorated by loving hands at the appointed seasons. A few years since, John B. Batchelder, Esq., in early life a resident, and educated in the town, awakened a lively interest in an enlargement and beautifying of this ancient cemetery, and a wonderful change was effected. It is now a pleasant and ample inclosure, adorned with trees and blooming with flowers, while new care and taste and generous expenditure are at once observable in the erection of monuments for the dead.

Here, also, at the "Old Smith Meeting-House," are held the public services of the soldiers' "Memorial Day," when there is a general gathering of the people of the town.

THE CENTRE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—The twenty-five persons from the old First Church were organized into a new church by an invited council on the 8th of March, 1826. Rev. Heman Rood, the first pastor, was ordained July 12, 1826. A new house of worship was built at a cost of three thousand five hundred dollars, and dedicated September 30, 1827. Mr. Rood continued with the church three and a half years from his ordination.

In 1835, December 16th, Rev. Daniel Lancaster, who had removed from the old First Church, was installed pastor. He finished a laborious and most successful ministry January 25, 1852, having done service in the town more than twenty-seven years. In the following spring, April 22, 1852, the Rev. Roger M. Sargent was installed pastor, who continued with the church till January 31, 1860, when he was dismissed, and accepted a call from Farmington, N. H. June 13, 1860, the Rev. Joseph Blake, D.D., was installed, and, finding his health failing, was dismissed February 14, 1871. But on October 25th, having been recalled by the church, he was re-installed, and continued pastor till his final dismissal, June 3, 1879, though he had removed from the town two months before. His ministry was more than eighteen years. Immediately on his leaving, the parish applied to Rev. S. S. N. Greeley, a townsman, who had returned after three years in the army and eight years ministry in the city of Oswego, N. Y., to recruit in health in the wonderful air of the mountains. He told the committee he did not come back to New Hampshire to take churches, nor to remain in his childhood's home; but, in the destitution of the people and church, of the fathers, he would give them a few Sabbaths till they could look round. It is sufficient to remark that the "coming man" has not come yet, and it has now been more than seven years.

IRON-WORKS CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH WAS constituted by an ecclesiastical council, October 20, 1830. On the 12th of September the church extended a call to Mr. Charles G. Safford, a recent graduate from Andover, who was ordained pastor September 28, 1831. On the 12th of June, 1836, Rev. Mr. Safford was dismissed on account of failing health. There had been two seasons of revival during his ministry of four years and nine months, and fifty-six new members had come into the church.

Early in the year 1838 a revival commenced under the labors of Rev. Jeremiah Blake, M.D., a student in Gilmanton Theological Seminary, more powerful than any yet witnessed, which resulted in the addition of sixty-two to the church, fifty-five in one day by profession. On January 31, 1839, Rev. Stephen S. N. Greeley was ordained pastor of the church, (graduated at Dartmouth College in 1835; studied one year at Andover and two years at Gilmanton Theological Seminary). After nearly four years' pleasant labor among his townsmen, Mr. Greeley received an earnest call to the Congregational Church in New Market (Lamprey River). The church there was in great trial at the time from outside pressure, but was "fighting a good fight"—and the field was an important one. It was to be made manifest that the Christian Churches did not desire to "bind the fetters on the slave!" Mr. Greeley requested dismissal from the church at Gilmanton Iron-Works, which was approved by council October 19, 1842, had a lively time in his new field the first few months, with five years pleasant labor following, till called to the then Seventh Church in Springfield, Mass. (Chicopee Falls). On the 6th of November, 1844, the church at the Iron Works received another pastor in the ordination of the Rev. Rufus Childs. He was pastor at the time "Lancaster's History" was issued; but in the church records there appears no statement of the date of his dismissal. It must have been near the close of 1855, for on the first Sabbath in 1856 (January 3d) it is stated that the pulpit was occupied by Rev. Jairus Ordway. Subsequently Mr. Ordway was engaged as acting pastor, and remained with the church till March 1, 1861. December 1, 1870, Rev. N. S. Moore commenced labor as acting pastor, and closed his labors of three years' continuance, December 28, 1873. July 22, 1875, Rev. George Rogers (from England) was ordained pastor, and in failing health was dismissed by Council February 22, 1877. He soon died, August 30, 1877, Mr. Charles L. Tomblin succeeded; supplied till June 1, 1878, and was followed by Mr. Cassander C. Sampson in one year's service.

January 1, 1880, Rev. E. J. Roke (also from England) commenced a year's service, and closed his labors April 1, 1881.

On the 12th of December, 1882, the church extended a unanimous call to Rev. Lyman White, for some years pastor in Deerfield, but had been supplying the Iron-Works pulpit for a season. He is still with the church as acting pastor, strong in the confidence of his people, and, as a minister, able, faithful and useful.

THE FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH, GILMANTON IRON WORKS.—The Free-Will Baptist Church at Gilmanton Iron-Works was organized between the years 1785 and 1790. The denomination was in its infancy, with but few ministers of the gospel; therefore, only a few of the churches had a settled pastor for the first thirty or forty years. These servants of the Lord "had a mind to work;" so they frequently visited and encouraged the destitute churches. This church had a few stated supplies by such men as Elders Abel Glidden, Thomas Flanders and Ezra Ham, until about 1835 when Elder Hezekiah Buzzell was settled as pastor of the church, and continued with them some five years. After his retirement the church has had the following succession of pastors, in their order, down to the present time: Rev. Samuel P. Fernald, from 1840-49; Benjamin McMurphy, 1849-52; Ichabod R. Cook, 1852-55; Thomas Keniston, 1855-60; John M. Durgin, 1860-62; Moses Quimby, 1862-65; Gilman Sanborn, 1866-68; John C. Osgood, 1868-73; John M. Durgin, 1873-75; John B. Leighton, 1875-77; Wallace W. Brown, 1877-79; George W. Price, 1879-81; Moses Quimby, 1881-83; Orrin Pitts, 1883-85; James C. Nelson, 1885, present pastor. In quite recent years the congregation has rejoiced in the possession of a commodious and tasteful house of worship, and two years since received from Samuel Goodwin, Esq., a native, but a successful business man in New York City, the very desirable gift of a tower-clock and bell.

THE FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH, LOWER GILMANTON.—Rev. H. B. Huntoon, present pastor of this church furnishes the following report after diligent search for facts for this history, saying, "It is very imperfect, but the best I could do with the little material I have at command."

The Free-Will Baptist Church was organized at Lower Gilmanton January 8, 1860, and enrolls the following pastors, with periods of labor: Moses Folsom, two years; John Malvern, one; J. C. Osgood, one; C. B. Griffin, two; J. G. Munsey, four; D. L. Edgerly, two; John M. Durgin, one; C. L. Plummer, two; John Chamberlain, one; L. E. Hall, two and a half; H. B. Huntoon, present pastor.

For many years the church at Lower Gilmanton was Calvinistic Baptist. Lancaster's "History" (p. 199) states that it was organized November 16, 1773, and on the 14th of June, 1786, settled as pastor Elder Walter Powers, who continued with them about twenty years. He was succeeded by Elder Phineas Richardson, who resigned his care of the church after a ministry of eighteen years. It was with deep regret that the church parted with him. The greatest harmony had existed, and one hundred and sixteen new members had been brought into the church.

At two different periods after the retirement of Elder Richardson the church was supplied by Elder Hiram D. Hodge, an unusually interesting preacher—scholarly, logical, clear and convincing. There were several pastors or supplies after he left; but as time went on, emigration and death had reduced the church to the degree that they finally ceased to maintain a distinct organization, and the very few that are yet living unite in service with the Free-Will Baptists, who occupy the house of worship on the old location, but reconstructed from the old timber, neat, tasteful, a smaller house with a larger liberty!

In the by-gone years Lower Gilmanton was a live and prosperous section of the town, and many were the travelers by the rattling stage-coach, and many the wearied teams with their drivers, who found rest and abundant supply for all pressing needs at the well-filled barns and loaded tables of "Major Parish." He was a landlord of the old school; genial, witty, attentive to his customers, and, in business matters, one that "knew how to keep a hotel." Here were the law-offices of Benjamin Emerson and John Ham, Esqs., with their pleasant and spacious residences, and here were stores and varied industries that were pursued with profit. But in these latter days business is not rushing. As with many hopeful localities in earlier times, a change has become strikingly evident; from every direction roundabout the remaining people the voice of the steam-engine is heard in the land, but it steers quite clear of this section.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.—Lancaster ("History," p. 204), in a brief paragraph, states that "A Society of Friends was organized in Gilmanton about the year 1780." Well do citizens remember the quiet, happy old age of some of these early founders. They were industrious, self-controlled, honest, truthful, and, as citizens, always interested in the prosperity of the town, and numbers of them long occupied official positions. They are all dead, but the church or society still lives. A little group of the children of the early sires still keep up the organization, hold regular meetings, stir up one another's pure minds by way of remembrance, or devoutly "meditate." They are notable examples of the perseverance of the saints. Some five years ago they took down the old house where their fathers worshiped, and on the old site in the Academy village erected as commodious, well-planned, thoroughly-finished and pleasant a Sabbath home as any people need desire, and while their children are, in numbers of instances, by marriage or removal, absorbed into other congregations, still they are determined that a remnant shall remain.

THE METHODIST CHURCH.—Two Methodist classes (1807-1818) were established here, connected with the Northfield Circuit, and had only occasional preaching. In 1826-7 a brick meeting-house was built, at a cost of about two thousand five hundred dollars, which was dedicated in 1827. Elder George Storrs preached the sermon. He was on the circuit two years (1828-29) and was a strong man. He became famous in the early days of anti-slavery as a bold and convincing lecturer. He was the man who was arrested while on his knees in prayer in the Congregational pulpit in Pittsfield, where the pastor, Rev. Jonathan Curtis, had invited him to lecture.

Lancaster's "History" records, through quite a series of years, the succession of ministers in the Methodist Church, but at this date it is a lengthy roll, and mostly a very worthy one, for which there is neither space nor necessity for record here. The wheel turns round, and each man jumps off at the appointed locality only for a season. The church has experienced trying losses by removals and deaths of efficient members, and lives to-day only by severe sacrifices. But it has held on its way perseveringly and usefully, and has the best wishes of the entire community that it may continue long and prosper.

The Villages.—GILMANTON IRON-WORKS.—We have spoken of the settlement at Lower Gilmanton, past and present, and of the quiet section full of tender memories, where, by the old Smith Meeting-House, the sod was early opened to receive the dead. A few words concerning the Iron-Works village may be due in this connection. There are not smelting furnaces, nor heavy castings and wondrous mouldings of glowing metal in these days, as strangers suppose, at Gilmanton Iron-Works. But in the early settlement of the place there were discovered here and there, and especially in the neighboring Suncook or Lougee Pond, deposits of iron ore. Yankee contrivance lifted this ore from its bed twenty feet under water and established "works," and for a time prosecuted the making of iron for the market. But it was found ere long that the obtaining the ore under difficulties and the limited supply, so far as then known, would forbid continuance of the undertaking as a paying investment. But it gave name to "Avery town," as the first designation was, and from the early day it has been known as "Gilmanton Iron-Works."

It has a fine water-power, furnishing opportunity for a large amount of machinery and manufactures. This power has long been utilized to considerable extent, and the village is a stirring business point, beyond any other locality in the town. There are signs of thrift and neatness about the homes of the people, and the village has improved every way in the recent years. There is evidence in stores and shops of lucrative business and in the professional walks,—three or more clergymen guard their spiritual folds, four or more physicians have care for the health of the people, and, that the right may prevail, the genial and watchful Colonel Thomas Cogswell pays honor due to "the Majesty of Law;" has a busy life in adjusting the claims of law and equity between man and man,—"Fiat Justitia," etc. ("Let justice be done though the heavens fall.")

Gilmanton Iron-Works within the past year has established a new industry in the erection of a large shoe-factory. "It is in successful operation," writes one of the principal owners, "and gives employment to about seventy-five persons. We have a good location and a fine building." Among other manufacturing is the sash and blind-shop of Reuben Giles, the grist and saw-mill of Danford Cook, the plow-shop and rake-factory of the Marsh Brothers. All these are cheerfully prosperous.

The village of the Iron-Works, lying low under surrounding hills, at the water-level, would not be judged as healthful as other portions of the town. But large is the number who have, at a very advanced age, reached the bounds that were set that no man can pass.

On the 21st of August, 1885, a prominent citizen, Moses P. Page, died, a citizen aged and so prominent as to challenge some special notice. He lived to within two months of ninety years, being eighty-nine years and ten months. He was born in Gilmanton October 30, 1795, and, with the exception of a single year, passed his whole life in town. He was educated in the town school and Gilmanton Academy, and commenced mercantile life in Lower Gilmanton; then at Gilmanton Iron-Works in 1818; opening a store, he continued a successful merchant fifty years. Mr. Page was one of the thirteen who formed the Congregational Church in Gilmanton Iron-Works. He was a constant attendant upon public worship and a daily reader of the Scriptures. He also kept himself informed in relation to the doings of the various benevolent societies. While living he made the following donations: To the American Home Missionary Society, $2500; to the New Hampshire Bible Society, $2500; to the American Board for Foreign Missions, $2500; to the New Hampshire Missionary Society, $2500; to the American Missionary Association for Educating the Colored People at the South, $10,000; to the Gilmanton Iron-Works Congregational Church, $3333; also his pew in the meeting-house for the minister and his family; and to said society, by his will, he gave his dwelling-house for a parsonage. His gifts in all amounted to about $25,000.

THE CENTRE VILLAGE.—The Centre village, Academy village, (or, vulgarly, Gilmanton Corner), needs but brief mention; for, though greatly changed in many respects, it is as pleasant to the eye as it ever was. It is reduced in population and wealth, yet has many visitors from near and far, who come and go. The mountains hold fast their old positions, "as the mountains were round about Jerusalem; the little hills rejoice on every side," and rising suns and evening sunsets are glorious to the vision. "Do you keep painted up, and the village neat and tidy, as when I went to school at the academy?" asked the worthy president of the New Hampshire Medical Society. Generally so, and a little more so, though the ability to gratify taste is far less than the desire. The attractions for business men and money-making are not strong. There are no facilities for manufactures nor the convenience of railroad stations, and yet every day the sharp whistle of engines, and often the rumble of wheels, are distinctly heard from the four cardinal points; but, to the waiting traveler, eight, ten or twelve miles of out-stretched country must be first passed over ere the eye sees what seemed so nigh at hand. It is most forcibly suggestive of the love-song in one of the operas, "Thou art so near and yet so far!" But, if not pressed by urgent business, these stage and carriage-rides are highly enjoyable, and, to the worn and weary under the cares of life, seeking for quiet, there is a feeling of positive relief in deliverance from smoke and noise and the endless excitements of large towns and cities. Gilmanton has some very pleasant residences, with tasteful surroundings, as, for instance, the country-seat of Z. S. Kitchen, Esq., of New York, built with all modern improvements but a few years since; then, nearly opposite, the massive old homestead of Major Ebenezer Eastman, once the home of Mary Butler, now improved, owned and occupied in the summer months by Dr. J. M. W. Kitchen, of New York; then the lofty mansion, purchased and improved a year ago by the celebrated lecturer, John L. Stoddard. From these points, also from the "Prospect House," the views are uncommonly fine. Another home, with a wonderful outlook, is that of Colonel Cyrus Gilman, on the southern outskirts of the village; also, the entire sweep of the horizon at Oakland Cottage, the residence of J. Horace Drew, Esq. The late Rev. Dr. Prime ("Ireneus" of the New York Observer), while boarding there in a recent summer, sent a capital letter to his paper, extracts from which will close this article.

"OAKLAND COTTAGE," with its pleasant outlying fields, was once Copp's Hill, from the owner of years ago. There resided in the family an ancient and pious spinster, quiet and meditative, to whom in the love of nature holding communion with her visible forms, she spake a varied language.

The view of the village from this high point, especially before the obscuring growth of trees and shrubbery on streets and in yards, was like a clear-cut picture. "I sit by my window on beautiful summer mornings," said the ancient dame, "and look down upon the plain and upon the village, and I think of Sodom and Gomorrah!"

Doubtless, she had not the least intention of complimenting the villagers. It was only because her thoughts ran Scripturally. There is a fine view from the vicinity of the recent home of Levi Grant, Esq., of the Tamworth and Sandwich Mountains, and one of the best in all the region of Mount Washington. A lovely view is also had of distant mountain scenery, parts of Loudon, Canterbury, the Shaker village, part of Concord, etc., from the dwelling of Mr. Richard D. Varney, immediately in the village. Then, but a little way off, stands and firmly abides the well-known Peaked Hill, and here the view transcends the largest anticipations of its visitors. Such is its relative position that it seems to stand alone, detached from the mountain range of which it is really a part, while, as on the apex of a cone, the world falls off on every hand, and rises again toward the distant horizon. Here one gets a marvelous view of the mountain scenery in New Hampshire, and extending into Maine and Vermont. Peaked Hill has been for many years a favorite resort for pleasure parties, for students of the academy and visitors who love to climb for the sake of the climbing.

There are other places of interest that are worth the visiting, as Porcupine Ledge, the Gulf, Lougee

Pond, with its fine fishing, and Loon Pond, the largest and most beautiful body of water in this region, where sail-boats may have the most ample swing.

Beside this pond the traveled road leading to Lower Gilmanton, Pittsfield, etc., rises into a long and quite tedious hill, but on reaching the "height of land," while the horse should stand and rest a little, the traveler if possessed of any "sense of the beautiful," will be very willing to have him. A lady artist from Boston said, in her enthusiasm, "I want to get me a tent and a cooking-stove, and just come here and stay."

If one shall continue his tour some two miles beyond this hill, there will come in sight the beautiful and yet higher grounds and farm of Jeremiah Wilson, Esq., deceased, at present owned and cultivated by his nephew and heir, George W. Sanborn, Esq. The prospect from this summit is of wide extent, and exceptionally striking in variety. The location of the old Wilson mansion is very commanding, and has about it a yet-lingering savor of aristocracy—an element which, for many years, was attributed to "Gilmanton Corner" pre-eminently; but whether pervading the atmosphere like a miasm, or like an impalpable agent in nature, when one would put his finger upon it, it was not there! But this owner and occupant of the Wilson property, if not an aristocrat, is a periodical auto-craze, whose favor with his fellow-citizens is worthy to be put on record.

In years gone by, at the town-meetings, the strife of parties at the very opening was often fierce and long on the simple matter of the moderator. This was from the idea that whatever might be the political stripe of the moderator, so would be the elections of the day. He was a sort of standing prophecy, a forecasting shadow. This is all changed, and being struck with the facts in a later acquaintance with Gilmanton, that no sooner is a town-meeting assembled than George W. Sanborn is called to the chair, a little note was sent to him, saying,—

"Tell me about the late Jeremiah Wilson—the date of birth and death and anything of family history; also, have you any records from which you could tell me how many times you have been moderator of Gilmanton town-meetings?"

There was returned soon the following racy reply:

"Dear Sir: I herewith send you date of death of Esquire Wilson and matters pertaining to his family, taken partly from Belknap's and Lancaster's Histories, and partly from my own records. Please use what is pertinent to your object. As to your humble servant, I hardly perceive that there is anything that can adorn your article on Gilmanton or enhance its value. In answer to your question, I will say, I have had the honor to preside at twenty-one March elections, commencing in March, 1862, and including every one to the present time, excepting 1872, '73, '74; also at six and probably seven November elections (am not positive about that of 1868). Besides these, I have presided at six special town-meetings, so that in all I am confident my fellow-citizens have elected me moderator thirty-four times. I was born in Sandwich May 11, 1822 (I was entirely innocent of that). I was married to Mary Ann Brown, March 24, 1846—that was promiscuitated. My decease is not on record yet. In my youth I was taught at Gilmanton Academy by Sewell Greeley—"associate teacher," as he was called then. I trained, on several occasions, with Rev. S. S. X. Greeley, as chaplain of the Tenth Regiment, at ('general muster.') Been representative two years—1869-70—and worked hard on the farm most of the time.

"Yours, most respectfully,

"GEORGE W. SANDERS."

With thanks for information and assistance promptly conveyed, this section must close with reference to one more point of observation, with beautiful outlook in and around the Centre village of Gilmanton. Summer guests have named it, very prettily, "Sunset Rock." It is but a few rods northwest from the Prospect House, on the summit of a gentle rise of land, but from its relative position affording a broad sweep of horizon, with distant mountains, that is quite unusual and truly beautiful.

The following is a letter written to the New York Observer by "Ireneus."

"AMONG THE MOUNTAINS OF THE GRANITE STATE—GILMANTON: ITS BEAUTIFUL SITUATION, ITS ANCIENT PEOPLE, ITS SONS AND SCHOOLS.

"At Old Orchard Beach I celebrated the praises of Lake Winnepesaukee. If that does not spell the word as you learned it in your geographical days I can spell it twenty-five other ways, as it is in a work now lying near me, on New Hampshire. All right, so take your choice. It is by some writers regarded the most beautiful lake in America.

"A few years ago some friends of mine, Mr. and Mrs. Kitchin, of Twenty-third Street, traveling in the summer, became enamored of this Gilmanton village—this elevated, picturesque, cool, healthful and peaceful region. They returned and built a beautiful country seat. Remote from cities and unweaved with cares they find it a pleasant summer home. What we heard from them drew us to the hills of New Hampshire, and to this particular hill, of which I am writing. In the open air, at noon, in the shade on a hot day, it is as cool as a garden of cucumbers. We are at Mrs. Brew's farm-house, on 'Oakland Hill,'—the most commanding and beautiful site in this romantic region. From the summit we have a panorama of extraordinary extent and variety, with rare combination of sublimity and beauty. The circle of the horizon, fifty miles away in every direction, is a rampart of mountains, whose lofty peaks and graceful curves make a battlemented wall three hundred miles around, surmounted by an azure dome, in the zenith of which, this moment, glows the noonday sun. Nearest to my right hand is Mount Kearsarge, classic in all time for the story of naval war; Acuteity, full of history and poetry, and the Grand Monadnock and the two domes of the Etna monocks—the Indian for 'breaks,'—which they are fabled to resemble; Mt. Major, Mt. Minor and the great Moose Mountain; and, in the north, the mighty White Mountains, in grand array, make a blunt claim for this region to be called the 'Switzerland of America.' At least thirty different townships are in sight from our door. The population is sparse and does not increase. Young people are enticed by the commerce and arts and chances of the age to quit their native hills and seek 'fish-holes and pastures new' in other regions. Instead of saying,—'The fathers, where are they?' it is the children for whom you must inquire, and you get no answer. They are gone. But it is a remarkable place for longevity. Those who stay, live.—The town has records of more than fifty of its inhabitants who have lived more than ninety years; some one hundred, one hundred and three and one hundred and four years.

"This same Gilmanton is not the least among the tribes of the Granite State, for out of it have gone some of the most illustrious sons of New England. Among the original families was that of Adams, and by-and-by one of them beget a son, who beget John, who beget John Quincy, who beget Charles Francis; and so the family of Adams come out of the tribe of Gilmanton. Even so the house of Webster was, and still is, here, and one of that name beget Ebenezer, who beget two sons,—Ezra and Daniel,—and Daniel grew up in a town near by and became a mighty man. And time would fail me to speak of Crosswell, Clifford, Dudley, Clark, Eastman, Greeley, Hackett, Hume, Ineson, Moody, Nelson, Page, Parsons, Peaslee, Prescott, Sanborn, Shepard and many others whose names are familiar, and whose ancestors once dwelt among these hills. It is often said of a country like Scotland or New Hampshire, that it 'is a great country to go from;' and what better can be said of New England than,—'that it gives birth to good and great men. It may, indeed, be too small for them to grow in, and so the world is richer and better when they are driven to grow abroad on the face of the earth to be known and felt among men. Out of the best of the tribes may spring the leader, and thus the best becomes the greatest.

"Here is one way in which this town made itself a home, out of which arose men of mark. In the year 1792 the town raised a committee of twenty citizens to consider the question of founding an academy for higher education than the common school, and on the report of this committee they planted, endowed, and, in two years' time, had in operation an institution which has flourished from that day to this under a long series of successful and eminent teachers, fitting for college and business generations of young men who have made their mark in the church, the State and the world, and I will say, a better place for a boy's school is not to be found in New England, so far as my knowledge extends.

"By and by the trustees found, in their original constitution, a clause requiring them to provide instruction in 'the doctrines of religion revealed,' and, on the strength of this, they established a theological seminary, built a large brick edifice and called able and learned professors. They graduated from the opening, in 1845, some ten or twelve classes of young men. One of the graduates in its first class was the present pastor of the village church, Rev. S. S. X. Greeley, who adds to his pastoral work the care of a farm, and has a seat in the Legislature of the State, and is chairman of the House committee on education. But there was no call for this seminary to be perpetual. We have more seminaries and colleges than are needed now. It is more economical, wiser and better to concentrate the funds, the learning and energy of the churches on a few institutions, and make them first-class with all possible furnishings, than to multiply feeble colleges and seminaries in every State or section. This has been carried on to a deplorable excess, and a mortality among them, with a 'survival of the fittest,' tends to the improvement of education in the church and in the country."

Longevity.—The following is a portion of a letter written by a lady resident of Gilmanton in answer to a letter to Rev. Mr. Greeley (in his absence from home) by W. H. Ward, editor of the New York Independent, inquiring as to the truth of the report going the rounds of the newspapers, that only one child had been born in Gilmanton Iron-Works during the last five years:

"GILMANTON CENTRE VILLAGE.

"I have been talking by telephone with Rev. Dr. Blake, of Gilmanton Iron-Works, and learned that within the last five years only one child has been born there, and he is now more than four years old. We, in this Academy village, would not be muchly elated or too boastful over our neighbors, but during that time, in the families resident here, there have been seven or eight births.

"To those of us familiar with the rapid increase of population in the West, this feature of the inland towns of New England is strange and saddening. But 'we must count upon mercies,' and we certainly have our share of those in unusual second childhood, according to the common reckoning of that period. Not long ago a bright, old citizen, one hundred years old, wrote his name very legibly for his numerous callers. Her neighbor across the street received her friends on her ninety-fifth birthday, and, till about a year before her death, worked in her garden almost daily, took a deep interest in the important questions of the day and read without glasses to the last. In the very next house, with the granddaughter of Mary Butler, lived another, ninety-seven years old. A few yards beyond, one ninety-three, and in the house adjoining, bright and active at eighty-three, is one highly esteemed. On my right lives a widow eighty-one years of age, who does all the cooking for a house full of summer boarders, besides making butter and taking care of her garden, and reading without glasses more than many people of her age. Just across the academy green is a lady verging upon ninety. When not busy about her house she reads the best books of the day and entertains friends with her just criticisms and comments and her many pleasant recollections. She commenced the Bible with Scott's Commentary last January, reading the text, with all the notes and practical observations; and, if she lives, will finish it by the close of this year. There are many others I could add to this list of 'worthies,' and I have chosen these six widows, as they all have lived, within a few rods of each other.

"The young people go to the West and to the cities, and the census-taker is rightly vexed—but do not the pure air of these breezy hills, and 'the touch of the mountain-sun' seem to favor vigor of body and mind?

"S. B. C. G., in Manchester Mirror."

The centenarian alluded to in the above communication was Mr. Russell Philips. He was a native of Connecticut; passed his first seven years of life in New Hampshire, in London; moved into Gilmanton in 1824. He became a member of the Methodist Church, and was a brother in whom could well be reposed an unshaken confidence. He was an every-day religion.

His wife was Mary Merrill. They had seven children,—Charissa, Hiram, Calvert, Mary, Josephine, Phylena and Dr. Butler, of Suncook. On the 11th of June, eleven years ago, the oldest daughter became totally blind. There is, however, in this sad calamity, "light within," and she lives in waiting "for the dawning of the morning, when the shadows pass away."

Mr. Philips died September 15, 1874, aged one hundred years and six months.

It was intended to present in this article brief notices, or at least the names, of a multitude of distinguished men who were natives, or pursued their early education in Gilmanton, but space forbids.

By the census of 1880 the population of Gilmanton is fourteen hundred and eighty-five. By the records of its history, among the earliest settlers were a family of Weeds. The last to leave will be weeds, unless our young men come out of cities on to these farms, that have all the elements of beauty and fruitfulness.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THOMAS DURRELL.

There is always something encouraging and inspiring in the record of a brave and honest struggle with the difficulties of life and the untoward circumstances of one's lot, when that struggle results in success,—a success gained by honest and persistent endeavor. We have an example of this in the life of Thomas Durrell, who was born in Gilford, N. H., January 29, 1798. He was born and educated among a peculiar, tried and worthy people, among plain, frugal, solid, toiling pioneers,—a race quite different from those comprising the society of the present time. The principal capital of those days consisted in the virtues and personal energies of the people. In his boyhood our country knew very little of newspapers, libraries, academies and colleges; it knew chiefly country school-houses, and working, thinking men and women.

His grandfather was Eliphalet Durrell, an English emigrant who settled in Northwood, N. H., and was one of the pioneer farmers of the eighteenth century. The name, although domiciled in England for centuries, betrays its Norman French extraction.

Joseph, son of Eliphalet, married Olive Garmon, a descendant of Joseph Garmon, one of the early settlers of Northwood, and removed to Gilford, with his young wife, to make a home. Gilford was at that time very sparsely settled, the country a wilderness of rocks and woods, and every new-comer had to clear his land, fell the trees and, with courageous heart and hands, convert the forest into cultivated fields.

The young couple remained in Gilford for a few years, working with patient and unrelenting industry, and then removed to Gilmanton, where Mr. Durrell purchased a lot of land. Three children were born to Joseph and Olive (Garmon) Durrell,—Nicholas, Thomas and Polly, who married Jerry Hutchinson. Joseph Durrell died in 1819, at the age of forty-six, and his land was inherited by his two sons. Nicholas was a man of energy, a colonel in the militia. His barn was struck by lightning in 1831, with a loss of about one thousand dollars, and he soon after sold his interest in Gilmanton to his brother, and emigrated to Thornton, N. H., and died there.

Thomas Durrell married, April 19, 1819, Sarah, daughter of Levi and Esther (Melcher) Hutchinson. (Levi Hutchinson was a soldier in the War of the Revolution, and one of the detachment sent the night before the battle of Bunker Hill to throw up entrenchments there). Thomas and Sarah (Hutchinson) Durrell had eight children,—Joseph B., Ann M. (Mrs. John Wallace, of Sanbornton), Martha C. (died aged fourteen years), Sarah A. (Mrs. George Folsom), Thomas F. (died in California), Eliza J. (Mrs. Hiram Richardson, of Concord), Lewis E. and Charles W.

Mr. Durrell remained in Gilmanton, and for many years was one of the hardest-working men of this section. He continued making additions to his farm until he owned about two thousand five hundred acres in one body, and gave his name to Durrell's Mountain. An old citizen informs us that Mr. Durrell told him that he had made about forty miles of stone wall, and to the observer of the work to-day it would seem as if this was rather under than over-estimated. The same qualities which made him successful as a farmer recommended him to offices of trust. He devoted much time and attention to the public interests of the town, attended every town-meeting from the time he was a voter until the year of his death, and for many years was a man of much influence. He was often called to office in the town, served as selectman, representative, etc., and was honored by an election as county treasurer. In all his official duties the same safe conservatism, active energy and unflinching integrity which prevailed in his private life were exhibited. He was interested in the military organizations of the State, and in 1825 was appointed adjutant of the Tenth Regiment. Politically, Mr. Durrell was of the Jeffersonian and Jacksonian ideas, having always voted the straight Democratic ticket with one exception.

In 1861, Mrs. Durrell died, and the following year Mr. Durrell married Mrs. Francis A. Burns, and immediately purchased the James Bell estate, in Laconia, where he made his residence, attending to his numerous financial interests until his death, May 9, 1883, at the advanced age of eighty-five years. He was the owner of the Cerro Gordo Hotel, and after the destruction of that hotel by fire he erected several stores on this property. He was one of the incorporators of the Laconia National Bank, of which he was made a director, and was actively connected with various business enterprises. He was for many years a member of the Congregational Church at Gilmanton Iron-Works and the North Church, of Laconia.

Mr. Durrell was a fine-looking man, of pleasant manners, social, kind-hearted, careful and conservative in business matters. He was a man of good personal habits, of strong constitution, with good health, and retained the use of his faculties in an unusual manner. He adopted and maintained through life good rules of thought and good principles of conduct,—the soundest and best of rules, as his long life and his success fully testify. Thorough, positive and energetic, he accomplished much and was a valued and worthy citizen.

THOMAS COGSWELL, JR.

Thomas, youngest son of Hon. Thomas and Polly Noyes Cogswell, was born in Gilmanton February 8, 1841; was educated at Gilmanton Academy and Dartmouth College, from which institution he graduated in the class of 1863. In 1862, Mr. Cogswell enlisted in Company A, Fifteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, and was at once appointed first lieutenant, soon afterwards being promoted to captain. He was stationed in the Department of the Gulf, under General Banks, and was with his regiment at the siege and surrender of Port Hudson. Upon the expiration of his term of service, in 1863, Mr. Cogswell pursued the study of law with Messrs. Stevens & Vaughan, at Laconia, and at Harvard Law School, and was admitted as an attorney-at-law in the Supreme Court of New Hampshire in September, 1866. He commenced the practice of law at Gilmanton Iron-Works in December, 1866, where he has since remained.

The town of Gilmanton has generally been largely Republican in its politics; yet Mr. Cogswell, although a Democrat, has been elected to nearly every office in the gift of his townsmen. In 1868 was superintending school committee; in 1871 and '72, representative in the State Legislature, and the last year candidate of his party for Speaker; in 1880, 1881 and 1882 was one of the selectmen, and for two years was chairman of the board; in 1878 was chosen State Senator from District No. 6. Mr. Cogswell was appointed colonel on Governor Weston's staff in 1871. In addition to a busy professional life, Mr. Cogswell has carried on extensive farming operations, and has made great improvements on the large farm formerly occupied by his ancestors.

In the cause of education Mr. Cogswell has always been active, and for many years has been one of the board of trustees of Gilmanton Academy, and at the present time is president and treasurer of the same. Mr. Cogswell is noted for his liberality and public spirit, and large numbers of poor people have cause to remember him as a good friend in their time of need.

Mr. Cogswell is a member of Winnepesaukee Lodge of F. and A. Masons; also of Post 37, Grand Army of the Republic, at Laconia, and Crystal Lake Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, Gilmanton Iron-Works. In 1873, Mr. Cogswell married Florence, daughter of R. D. Mooers, of Manchester, and has three children,—one daughter and two sons.

HISTORY OF LACONIA.

Geographical—Early History—Endicott Rock—Original Owners of Land—Former Proprietors of Laconia Village—Meredith Bridge in 1812—Laconia in 1842—The First Tavern—First Saw-Mill.

THE town of Laconia lies near the centre of the county, and is bounded as follows: North by Meredith; East, Gilford and Long Bay; South, Belmont and Lake Winnesquam; West, by Lake Winnesquam.

In the year 1622 "the council established at Plymouth, in the county of Devon, for the planting, ruling and governing of New England, in America," granted to Captain John Mason "all the lands between the rivers Merrimack and Sagadahoc, extending back to the great lakes and rivers of Canada, and this was called Laconia." This was the famous Masonian grant which so much and so long affected the geography and history of the province of New Hampshire.

In laying out a new township from Meredith and Gilford the town fathers very properly and appropriately sought to commemorate the historical fact above mentioned and chose the present name of Laconia. For this reason much of the early history of Laconia will be found in the histories of Gilmanton and Meredith. The population of Laconia, according to the census of 1880, was about three thousand eight hundred, but it is probable that the increase since that time will carry the number of inhabitants to four thousand and over.

Strange as it may appear, the territory of Laconia was once claimed as within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts Bay Colony. As early as 1638 the colony had sent out a surveying party, who ascended the Merrimack River and marked a tree somewhere near the confluence of the Penigewasset and Winnipisogee Rivers as the northern bound of the colony. Some years later, "upon perusal of our charter," they of the Bay Colony who had the affairs of the settlement in charge decided that they had not extended their claim far enough north into the wilderness; so they dispatched a new party into the north-land to expand their frontier. Accordingly, in May, 1652, Captain Simon Willard and Edward Johnson were named as commissioners. They started from Ipswich in a sail-boat with a small company of assistants, and sailed up the Merrimack River. In the company was Jonathan Luce, John Sherman and at least two Indians. The river was the Indian thoroughfare, and around the numerous falls of its course the red men had paths, called carrying places. There is no record extant of how the expedition overcame the natural obstacles of the journey; but certain it is that they arrived at the Weirs August 1, 1652, and there marked a boulder as the north bound of the colony. They returned to the lower settlements after an absence of nineteen days, and for nearly two centuries their monument was lost to human ken.

In 1725, John Lovewell, with his band, traversed the wilderness, seeking for the scalps of hostile Indians, but it was years later before the white men came to stay.

The rock marked by Simon Willard and party has had a history. Its location was rediscovered by chance about the year 1854, while making an excavation in the channel, and it was visited by Judge Sawyer, Philip Carrigain and others interested in historical subjects. The Lake Company had raised the water of the lake by a dam, and it was exposed to the action of ice, and from fear that the inscription would be entirely lost, J. A. Dupee, a former treasurer of the Lake Company, sent Italian artists to make a cast of the inscription, and fac-similes were made, one of which can be seen at the New Hampshire Historical Society's rooms in Concord. The lovers of history and the antique, however, were not satisfied with doing this alone, but agitated the matter, and at last, in 1883, got an appropriation from the State Legislature for raising the rock above the surface, and surrounding it by safeguards against further harm. The Legislature of 1885 made a further appropriation. Hon. John Kimball, E. P. Jewell, Esq., and W. E. Buck are the commissioners having the business in charge.

This bound lost all interest for the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1749, when the present boundary between the two States was established.

LETTERS ON STONE.

Original Owners of Land.—Colonel Samuel Ladd bought the land on what is now called Ladd Hill in 1780. He soon after purchased two and a half acres on the east side of the river, of Samuel Jewett, for seven Spanish milled dollars. The land on the other side of the river he already owned. A saw-mill was soon after erected on this lot of land, and as the water privilege was better, was an improvement over the mill at "Wears."

Former Owners of Laconia Village.—The land on the north side of Winnepesaukee River was first owned by Master (schoolmaster) James, of Exeter. Stephen Gale, of Gilmanston, next purchased the land and sold it to Colonel Samuel Ladd in 1783. This tract of land ran from where the river empties into Lake Winnesquam to a point near the Church Street bridge, and embraced all the land between this line and the river. Colonel Ladd also purchased all the land possible adjoining this property, and probably owned about all that the present village of Laconia covers north of the river. When Colonel Ladd died, in 1801, his property was divided among the heirs and a large portion of the land was inherited by the wife of Stephen Perley, Esq. When the town of Gilmanston was divided into lots, the land on the south side of the river, from the outlet at Round Bay to Gove's Point, was divided into two lots about one hundred and twenty rods wide. Most of this property was first owned by James Conner and John Lowe, but was soon after purchased by Samuel Jewett, together with other land further to the east. Daniel Avery and Dr. Bowman afterwards bought part of this property.

The land where the first settlement was made in Laconia was near the head of Round Bay, and was purchased by Ebenezer Smith of John Purmont, the original owner.

Meredith Bridge in 1813.—The late Timothy D. Somes came to Meredith Bridge in 1813, and, in a statement made a short time before his death (in 1884), gives the following interesting facts regarding the Bridge at that time: He states that there was but one church then, and no settled minister in town. The church was built by individuals and belonged to no particular denomination; was a small building and stood on the lots just below the present Willard Hotel. There was a cotton-mill where the brick Belknap Mill now stands; this building was of the same size on the ground in 1813 as to-day, and was called the Avery Mill. The owners were Daniel Avery, Daniel Tucker, Stephen Perley, and perhaps others were also interested. This mill was burned down some eight or nine years after Mr. Somes came here. There was a clothing-mill at the end of Mill Street bridge, on the site now occupied by J. W. Busiel & Co.'s dye-house. This clothing-mill was owned and operated by Samuel and Nathan Bean.

There was an oil-mill a few feet above the clothing-mill owned by Stephen Perley,—a small mill, with one set of stones. The oil was sold and used for painting purposes. Daniel Tucker owned a blacksmith-shop where L. F. Busiel's hosiery-mill is to-day. Tucker's shop was run by water-power and had a small trip-hammer. He manufactured axes, scythes, shears and other edge-tools. There was a bell foundry just below Tucker's shop, owned and run by the well-known Holbrooks. They cast the first bell rung in town; this bell was hung in the bell-tower of the cotton-factory. The Holbrooks afterwards left town and continued business in Massachusetts, where they achieved a national reputation. The North Church bell and other bells in town were cast by the Holbrooks.

There was a small, narrow bridge across the river on Main Street at that time, near where the present bridge is located. The bridge had no railing then; but a man named French fell off into the water and was drowned soon after Mr. Somes came here, and then the bridge was supplied with a railing.

On the Gilford side was a saw-mill owned by Dudley Ladd. It stood near the end of Mill Street bridge, on the Baldwin site. There was a grist-mill on the site now occupied by the Pitman picker-house, owned by Jonathan Ladd, a brother of Dudley Ladd. The house where Rev. J. P. Atkinson lives was, in 1813, kept as a hotel by Jonathan Folsom, and was probably the first hotel in the place.

The road through the village was the old Province road; the only road to Lake village was what is now called Lake Street. At Lake village Mr. Folsom had at that time a saw-mill, and a grist-mill on the Meredith, or Laconia, side of the river. There were only five houses on the Gilford side at Lake village in 1829. Mr. Folsom's house was the only dwelling at Lake village in 1813 on that side of the river.

There were but thirty-four houses at Meredith Bridge in 1813, on both sides of the river, and some of these were mere shanties. The best house in town then was the John A. Harper residence, where Mrs. Dr. Prescott now lives. Mr. Harper was the only lawyer in town, and was an able man; was at one time a member of Congress.

The mails were frequently carried from Concord to Centre Harbor on horseback. No wagons were to be seen on the streets when Mr. Somes came here, but all business seemed to be done on horseback. It was no uncommon thing to see four persons on one horse, and Mr. Somes stated that he had been one of three persons on a horse's back many times. The first wagon ever made in these parts was built by James Jackson, in Meredith.

The leading spirits then at Meredith Bridge were John A. Harper; Stephen Perley, who lived on the spot now occupied by the Parker block; Dudley Ladd; Jonathan Ladd; Asa D. Eager, who lived where Gove's Block now is; Deacon Kimball, who carried on an earthenware business on the lot next to the Gilford Hosiery boarding-house; Daniel Avery, who lived where the residence of W. L. Melcher, Esq., is now located, in the house called the Andrew Woodman house: Mr. Avery had a small store nearly opposite his residence, where he sold groceries and rum. Soon after 1813, Mr. Avery went into the potash business in a building just south of his store. Dr. Zaddock Bowman was the only physician in town; he lived where D. A. Tilton's house stands. The doctor was very peculiar and eccentric; not much of a physician, but did what business there was, and also made money by letting money and farming; was a short, thick-set man, and owned a large amount of land.

Mr. Somes spoke very highly of Stephen Perley, and said that no man left his impress more distinctly than Mr. Perley. He was a large, noble-looking man, owned a great deal of property, did a large business and was connected with all the enterprises that tended to build up the town. Mr. Perley kept the post-office for quite a number of years; was an active Democrat; kept a general supply store, and, as usual in those days, sold rum, but it is said never drank any himself. In 1813 Mr. Perley traded in a small wooden building, where afterwards a brick store was erected, about half of which is now standing on the corner of Main and Mill Streets. There was no Main Street then above Mill Street. The first place where Mr. Somes attended school was in a little, old-fashioned school-house near the present location of Huse's machine-shop. In 1813 a small brook ran through Bank Square, following what is now the course of the canal. The brook was crossed by small bridges of one or two planks.

A copy of the Belknap Gazette, printed in 1842, gives a very good idea of the village of Laconia at that time. Colonel Charles Lane was the editor and publisher of the Gazette, and from its columns it appears that there were in the place three cotton-mills, a woolen-mill, grist-mill, saw-mills, shingle, clap-board, sash and door machinery, a large tannery and various other industries. There was a large printing establishment operated by D. B. Allison, with water-power press, and a bindery and book-store connected. There were ten stores, two apothecaries, one jeweler and watchmaker, two barbers, two physicians, five lawyers, three clergymen, three taverns, three new churches, well finished and painted, and one academy in a flourishing condition. William Clark, Benjamin Boardman, Lyman B. Walker and H. L. Hazelton were of the legal fraternity. Nathaniel A. Stephens ran a tailor shop over George L. Sibley's general merchandise store. Lewis H. Ham was a dealer in groceries and provisions. A. G. Folsom was also in the grocery business, and William M. Ladd sold patent medicines and drugs. Wilson & Barron and Gale, Pitman & Co., general merchandise, were also in business at this time.

The regular stage line went through from Holderness to Boston in one day, at that time leaving the Belknap Hotel at six o'clock in the morning, going three days in the week by way of Pittsfield and Exeter, and the remainder of the time via Concord and Manchester.

Dr. Josiah Crosby had just opened an eye and ear infirmary. The Gilford Academy was under the instruction of Joshua M. Pitman. S. J. Osgood the barber advertised his business. Gove & Currier were dealers in furniture, opposite John C. Moulton's tavern. In 1842, New Hampton was the only town in Belknap County that did not permit the open sale of liquor; but in October, 1842, all the public-houses in Laconia claimed to discontinue the sale of ardent spirits. A declaration of independence was issued in 1843, signed by one hundred and two citizens, who pledged themselves to prevent the sale of liquor in the town. Soon after this it was announced that the sale of intoxicating drinks in the village had entirely ceased. The Meredith Bridge Washingtonian Total Abstinence Association, Miss Harriet Gale, secretary, was then in active operation.

First Tavern.—The first public-house erected within the precincts of what is now Laconia village was built about 1783, and stood a short distance above the Main Street bridge of to-day. A store and stable were connected with the establishment. The tavern proved to be a handy "half-way house" between Gilman-ton and Meredith Parade.

A log house was built on the spot where W. D. Huse's machine-shop now stands, about 1780, and after the saw-mill was started was replaced. This second building stood, with more or less repairs, until a few years ago.

The first saw-mill in town was built at Weirs, in 1766, by the proprietors of the township. Ebenezer Smith and William Mead had charge of the mill, and paid rent for the same. The iron-work for this mill was brought from Exeter, and the wood-work was hewn on the spot. The power was obtained from a large under-shot wheel. The mill, although of course a rude affair, answered all purposes and remained in use for many years. For the first ten years after the mill was built the logs were sawed on the "halves" plan, and one-quarter went to the owners of the mill for rent.

CHAPTER II.

ECCLÉSIASTICAL HISTORY.

Congregational Church.—The first religious organization in Meredith Bridge was incorporated by an act of the Legislature, in 1811, as the Meredith Bridge Religious Society. The members of the original society were Stephen Purley, Daniel Avery, John A. Harper, John Smith, Jonathan Ladd, Simeon Taylor, Dudley Ladd, Daniel Kimball, Daniel Tucker, Horatio G. Prescott, Samuel H. Bean, John Burleigh, Josiah Randlet, James Crockett, Samuel Jewett and Jacob Jewett. The first meeting of this society was held August 3, 1811. Their by-laws ordered that all moneys were to be raised by assessment on the members, in proportion to the ratable property of said members. The meeting-house, when built, was to be open to all religious denominations. The by-laws stated: "The use and occupation of the house shall be open to all religious denominations in such a way that no one proprietor thereof shall be barred from introducing any regular preacher of any religious denomination into said house for the purpose of preaching such a proportion of the time as shall be equal to his or her proportion of property therein."

In 1809 the lot south of what is now the Willard Hotel, containing about five rods front on Province road, was purchased by Daniel Avery, as trustee for the inhabitants, as a site for a church building. The price paid for the land was one hundred and twenty-five dollars, and the money was raised by subscription of twenty-seven of the business men and farmers in the vicinity.

Dr. Bowman offered a larger lot on what is now Court Street, and at a less price, but the Province road site was thought the better location, and, accordingly, the church was built there. The building was built largely by subscriptions of lumber and labor. One person gave a certain amount of lumber, another agreed to lay one thousand of shingles on the roof, and many others gave from a day to two weeks' labor on the edifice. The dimensions of the building were nearly fifty by forty feet, high-posted, with two rows of windows for light. The end facing the street was ornamented with a bell-tower and large steeple, with a wooden fish as a weather-vane. This steeple was a great affair for that time, and was considered by many the most beautiful church-steeple in all New England. Inside the church was a good-sized gallery, in which the pews were sold, which were of the old-style, square and high-backed.

This church building remained in use for twenty-six years, and was destroyed by fire on the morning of February 27, 1836.

Several missionaries of various denominations visited Meredith Bridge after the erection of the new church, but none of them appeared to remain very long. Rev. John Turner, of Massachusetts, was the first pastor who was rewarded with anything like success for his efforts. The following extract from a letter written by Mr. Turner, in 1823, and dated at Boston, Mass., will give some of the difficulties under which he and other clergymen labored at that time in Meredith Bridge:

"I was the first missionary who succeeded in gaining a congregation to hear me at Meredith Bridge. There preceded me three missionaries, whose names I do not now recollect, who, not being able to gather any of the people in a few days to hear them preach, and who encountered sour looks and hard words from everybody, were discouraged, and went away without doing anything, practically saying that the soil was too sterile to be broken up by the plowshare of the Gospel, and was incapable of culture; so they left it, as that which bears briars and thorns and is high worthless.

"If I mistake not, I made my first visit to that place as a missionary in June, 1813, under the direction of the Massachusetts Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, in whose employment I labored the whole time I was there. To them I looked, and from them I received my support. I first went on a commission of three months to all the towns destitute of a settled minister, which lay on every side of Winnipiseogee Lake, making Meredith Bridge my principal stand, and to use my own discretion in going from one place to another as I thought best. This commission was renewed from time to time, as it expired, for three years, in which I was constantly in their employment on that interesting ground, except a few weeks at a time when I visited my family and preached to the people of my charge. . . .

"The Congregational missionaries once passed through the country like shooting stars, making a lucid path; but being obliged by their commissions to pass on, they were not able to cultivate the seed sown. Sectarians were silent while they passed along, but then fell into their train, and turned the excitement which they had occasioned against the order by whom their attention had been roused to the things of religion, so that they hurt rather than benefited the cause in which they labored. I therefore refused to accept a commission of that kind, lest I should do an injury to the cause of Christ.

"My reception by the people of Meredith Bridge, when I first went among them, was by no means flattering. Sectarians of every name had blended their influence, and succeeded in planting a deep-rooted prejudice in the minds of all the people against the Congregational ministry. The first remarks I made in my journal on that ground I distinctly recollect to be nearly in the following words: 'This morning I came from Tiltonborough, over the lake to Alton, and walked to this place, the distance being sixteen miles, and came to Mr. Avery's before eight o'clock, to whom I had letters of introduction. I was weary and exhausted when I came out of the wilderness through which I passed, but when the village broke upon my eye the contrast was animating. Everything before me and around me was pleasant to the eye; but when I went from house to house and mingled with the inhabitants my heart sank within me. From eight o'clock in the morning to four in the afternoon I met not an individual who welcomed me in words or looks. But at four in the afternoon I found a family about half a mile out of the village, Mr. Jacob Jewett's, who received me with open arms, and welcomed me to their home.

"When I introduced myself to Mr. Jewett he said: 'I am very glad and very sorry to see you.' To my inquiries regarding his reply, he answered: 'I am glad to see a minister of the gospel; but I am sorry to see you here, for I know that you can do no good, for none will hear you preach, and you will be insulted and abused."

"But as hard looks and lowering countenances never broke my head or heart, I ventured to appoint a meeting for the Sabbath at the meeting-house. We were agreeably disappointed to find about fifty persons who turned out to hear the word of God. I did not visit in the village any more for three weeks, but preached to them, according to appointment, every Sabbath, and found the congregations increasing in number about fifty each succeeding Sabbath. Rightly knowing that the sectarians would let me alone while they thought I would soon leave the ground, I made my appointments from Sabbath to Sabbath, leading them to think, when an appointment was made, that it might be the last. In this way I kept them easy so that they broke not upon me, nor interfered in my labors, till I had awakened an interest among the people in my favor. Knowing that the prejudice among the people was so strong against notes, that if a minister should show a scrap of paper ever so small, while preaching, it would drive all out of the house, I preached extemporaneously to them for nine months, and had not even the Bible with me in the pulpit, lest they should think notes were hidden therein.

"There was another evil which I had to encounter, namely, a suggestion from some that the sermons were written and committed to memory, and preached a thousand times. They soon, however, gave me an opportunity to stop this by giving me three portions of Scripture in one day, as I was going into the pulpit, from which I preached to their satisfaction the three services of the day.

"Had it not been for the unbounded kindness and hospitality of Mr. Jacob Jewett, whose house and stable were ever open for my accommodation, I probably should have been discouraged at the outset, as others before me had been. . . . After I had been there about two months the church where I preached on the Sabbath was generally full."

After Mr. Turner, who remained about three years, came Rev. Jotham Sewell, Rev. Henry Sewell, Rev. Nathan Fiske (afterwards professor of Greek in Amherst College) and Rev. Francis Norwood. Mr. Norwood came in June, 1824, and the church was organized July 20th. He stayed till 1830; Rev. J. K. Young, from August 12, 1831, to 1866; Rev. H. M. Stone, 1868 to 1871; Rev. William T. Bacon, 1871 to 1876; Rev. J. E. Fullerton, 1877 to 1881. The present efficient pastor is Rev. Charles A. G. Thurston.

The society owns a large, substantial church edifice, with a clock-tower supporting a lofty and graceful spire. The interior is conveniently arranged; a large vestry below, capable of accommodating three hundred people, and a smaller vestry afford space for religious and social gatherings. A beautiful and spacious audience-room above affords one of the most pleasing interiors in the State.

The Laconia Free Baptist Church was organized

March 17, 1838. Rev. Nahum Brooks was the first pastor ordained here, and served till December 10, 1843; Rev. Silas Gaskill served from December 31, 1843, to April 4, 1844; Rev. J. D. Stewart, from April 4, 1844, to April 3, 1852; Rev. Ebenezer Fisk, from April 8, 1852, to September 8, 1853; Rev. G. H. Pinkham, from September 8, 1853, to May 24, 1855; Rev. A. Redlow, from September 7, 1855, to April, 1857; Rev. A. D. Smith, from September 5, 1857, to April, 1861; Rev. Arthur Caverno, from September 7, 1861, to April 5, 1862; Rev. C. H. Smith, from September 6, 1862, to May, 1864; Rev. A. D. Smith, from June 4, 1864, to May 8, 1873; Rev. F. H. Lyford, from May 8, 1873, to April 31, 1875; Rev. J. Frank Locke, from May 4, 1875, to April 1, 1876; Rev. Lewis Malvern, from May 6, 1876, to January 24, 1880; Rev. G. C. Waterman, from March 6, 1880, to April 2, 1881; Rev. F. D. George, from May 7, 1881, to January 17, 1883; Rev. Lewis Malvern, from January 17, 1883.

The present membership of the church is 179; the Sunday-school numbers 260. The church was built before 1840, and remodelled at an expense of $12,000 in 1873. It was burned to the ground October 14, 1876, and rebuilt the following year for $10,000. The society is composed of the strong business men of the village.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was first organized in 1838, and was in a flourishing condition for a number of years, when, from internal dissension, the church languished. It was resuscitated about 1860. At first they worshipped in the court-house and at Folsom Hall until, in 1868, the society purchased the Unitarian meeting-house. There are at present one hundred and twenty-five church members. The society owns the church edifice, clear of debt; they owe a small sum on the parsonage. Since 1860 the following pastors have been in charge: Revs. G. W. H. Clark, William H. Thomas, George S. Noyes, Calvin Holman, George W. Norris (who in 1868 raised the money for buying the meeting-house), B. W. Chase, H. B. Copp, T. Carter, E. R. Wilkins, S. C. Keeler and the present pastor, Rev. G. A. McLaughlin.

The meeting-house is a modest and attractive building of familiar New England architecture, having a tower with a bell and a pretty, tapering spire. The audience-room is tastefully frescoed, and contains a fine organ and appropriate appointments.

The Universalist Society was organized July 19, 1848, at Meredith Bridge. They built a meeting-house, employed a preacher and continued to hold services until about 1846, when the society languished. From that time until 1860 there were only occasional services held. At that time the organization was revived, preaching was supplied, and in 1867 the name was changed to the First Unitarian Society of Laconia. The church was repaired and meetings were held until the congregation outgrew their accommodations. In May of that year a committee was appointed to build a new church, and the next year the old building was sold to the Methodist Society. The new edifice cost over twenty thousand dollars, and was dedicated in 1868. It is centrally located, and is the most conspicuous building in the town. The interior is elaborately finished, containing, in the basement, a Sunday-school-room, a study, a dining-room and a kitchen, and above, a large audience-room, lighted by cathedral windows, with elegantly-paneled wall and ceiling and rich walnut furniture. The general effect of the room is pleasing, and expresses quiet elegance. Rev. Thomas L. Gorman was the first settled minister; he was succeeded, in 1869, by Rev. C. Y. De Normandie, who, in turn, was succeeded, in 1873, by Rev. Clarence Fowler; later, by Rev. James Collins, Rev. Enoch Powell, Rev. John D. Wells, and, in September, 1884, by the present pastor, Rev. James Pardee. The society includes about one hundred families.

The St. Joseph Roman Catholic Church.—For more than half a century there have been Catholics in Laconia and Lake village. As their numbers grew, they were occasionally visited by priests from other parishes, Fathers Dailey and McDonald, of Manchester, among others. Rev. T. H. Noiseux, then of Lancaster, gathered the faithful into a society about the close of the war, and stimulated them to raise money and build a church. Accordingly, a lot on Main Street was bought, and a building was erected, and was consecrated by Rt. Rev. David W. Bacon. The people now wanted a resident priest, and, in 1871, Rev. John W. Murphy was settled—the parish including Laconia, Lake village, Franklin, Ashland, Canaan, Lebanon, Hanover and other places. In April, 1872, Father Murphy was succeeded by Rev. M. T. Goodwin, a gentleman of great learning, eloquence and zeal, who reduced, by his exertions, the church debt.

The Catholic Church was burned July 1, 1877, having been struck by lightning; but the money for the erection of a new edifice was quickly raised. Father Goodwin left the parish the same year, and was succeeded the year following by the present incumbent, Rev. John Lambert, under whose ministrations the rebuilding of the church was conducted. The basement was first occupied February 24, 1879; the church was finished in 1881, and was consecrated the first Sunday in May.

In 1879 a convent school was opened in the village by four Sisters of Mercy, of whom Sister Margaret was superior. The school can accommodate two hundred scholars.

In September, 1881, the parish purchased a cemetery lot of six acres, which was consecrated July 5, 1885.

In 1884 Franklin was erected into a separate parish, Ashland and northern towns having been detached several years earlier.

The church is of Gothic architecture, cruciform, with tower on epistle side, and cost about six thousand dollars.

LACONIA—(Continued).

The Press—The Belknap Gazette—The Laconia Democrat—The Belknap Tocsin—Horse Railroad—Telephone Company—Roads and Bridges—Fire Department—Fire-Alarm Telegraph—First Fire-Engine—Libraries.

Belknap Gazette.—The Belknap Gazette was the first newspaper published in Meredith Bridge, and was started about 1840 by the late Colonel Charles Lane. Colonel Lane conducted an extensive establishment for those days, running a printing-office and book-bindery, located about where the post-office building now stands. Bibles, hymn-books and works of that kind were printed on a hand-press and furnished to order all complete. Colonel Lane was a Jeffersonian Democrat, and in 1843 the Whigs bought the paper and afterwards controlled it. Various editors and proprietors had the management of the Gazette after Colonel Lane, but the paper was discontinued in 1861. The late J. H. Brewster was the last proprietor, and his reason for stopping the publication was the war prices of paper and scarcity of laborers.

The Laconia Democrat.—In the year 1848, Abram Keach and D. K. Seaver, of Manchester, came to Meredith Bridge to print a weekly newspaper for Enoch Gordon. At this time Belknap and Carroll were the only counties in the State that had no "organs." The paper was called The New Hampshire Democrat, and the first number was printed the last week in December, 1848, and bore the date January 4, 1849. This issue bore the name of E. Gordon, publisher and proprietor; but as Gordon could furnish no security to carry out his contract with the printers, his connection was severed after one issue, and Messrs. Keach & Seaver assumed control, with J. Elkins, Esq., as editor. The paper was a success from the start, and was at that time said to be the neatest printed sheet in the State. May 13, 1850, Seaver retired from the business and Keach continued alone until 1852, when the paper passed into the hands of Samuel C. Baldwin. David A. Farrington of Concord was associated with Mr. Baldwin from 1854 to 1857 and then retired. Mr. Baldwin committed suicide, and the paper was purchased by Joseph B. Batchelder, January 24, 1862, who, in turn, disposed of the concern to O. A. J. Vaughan in January, 1868. Mr. Vaughan died April 6, 1876, and in June of that year William M. Kendall, Jr., of Lebanon, N. H., took control and united the Democrat and Weekly News, which he had previously published at Lebanon. The Democrat was enlarged and otherwise much improved about this time; but Mr. Kendall became weary of the business, and was succeeded in 1878 by Edwin C. Lewis and Fred. W. Sanborn. Mr. Sanborn retired in April, 1882, and the paper is now published by the firm of Lewis, Vaughan & Co. An evening edition was commenced in December, 1883, and continued about a year, but not receiving sufficient encouragement, was discontinued for the time being.

The Belknap Tocsin.—This paper was established as a Republican organ by Messrs. C. W. & A. J. Hackett, of Belmont, in the summer of 1881. The Tocsin was a large paper, neatly printed and ably edited. A daily edition was commenced about a year later, and the Lakeside News from Lake village merged with the Tocsin, Mr. E. G. Wilcomb, of the News, taking an active interest in the firm. The Hacketts shortly after gave up the business, and the paper was continued until March, 1884, at which time Mr. Wilcomb sold out to Lewis, Vaughan & Co., of the Democrat, and the Tocsin was discontinued. The paper did not receive a hearty support from the Republicans of the county, and it was evident from the first that the Tocsin would not long continue.

Horse Railroad.—The Laconia and Lake Village Horse Railroad was chartered at June session, 1881, of the New Hampshire Legislature. The grantees were A. G. Folsom, James H. Tilton, J. P. Hutchinson and Richard Gove. The capital stock was fixed at fifteen thousand dollars, and the road built in the summer of 1882. The first car was run over the road on Friday afternoon, August 18, 1882. The first annual meeting of the stockholders was held at Folsom Hall January 16, 1883. A. G. Folsom, J. P. Hutchinson, S. C. Clark, C. A. Busiel, S. S. Wiggin, R. Gove and S. B. Smith were elected directors, and subsequently A. G. Folsom was chosen president of the board, J. P. Hutchinson clerk, and W. L. Melcher treasurer. Bela S. Keniston was the first superintendent of the road. About two and one-half miles of track were laid, extending from the Williard Hotel, in Laconia, to the steamboat landing in Lake village. The road was a success from the commencement.

Telephone Company.—The Winnepesaukee Bell Telephone Company was incorporated April 23, 1881. E. H. Blaisdell was the first president; W. F. Knight, secretary; S. B. Smith, treasurer; Augustus Doe, D. W. Marsh, E. H. Blaisdell, G. H. Everett and E. C. Lewis. The capital raised amounted to $——. The lines of the company now extend to Lake village, Weirs, Meredith, Gilmanton, Tilton and Belmont.

Roads and Bridges.—The first bridge over the Winnepesaukee River was built in 1764, four years before the town of which Laconia was then a part was chartered under the name of Meredith. This bridge was built of logs and was termed a passable bridge. It stood, with occasional repairs, for nearly fifty years, and was replaced with a better structure about 1810. The bridge at Great Weirs was built in 1804.

In 1781 a road was built from the head of Round

Bay to the falls of the Winnepesaukee River, and from Folsom's Falls (Lake village) to what is now Church Street, and half of a bridge was built soon after, the town of Gilmanton building the other end of the bridge. The first bridge across Mill Street was built in 1788, a few years after the saw and grist-mills were put in operation.

Fire Department.—Soon after the erection of the cotton-mill in 1813, measures were taken to procure apparatus to extinguish fires, and the first fire-engine was purchased in 1815, and a suitable engine-house provided on Mill Street, in about the location of the Belknap boarding-house. There was no suction hose attached to the first engine, and it was therefore equipped with leather buckets, and the water poured into the top and forced out with the brakes. This engine was destroyed in 1855. The company to work the engine was incorporated in 1814 by the Legislature, and went under the name of Meredith Bridge Engine Company.

In 1834 a hose company was organized to operate force pumps, one of which was located in the yard of the cotton-mill, and the other just across the river, on Mill Street. This company was incorporated under the name of Meredith Bridge Hose Company, James Molineaux, Alvah Tucker and Abram Brigham being foremost in the enterprise.

The present fire precinct was established by the Legislature in 1849, and the hand tub "Torrent, No. 2," was purchased in that year, and a company was formed to man the machine. A store-house in the Belknap mill-yard was used for an engine-house for some time, until the precinct erected the house on Water Street, where the old Torrent is now stored. The Torrent boys were the first company at the Bridge to procure uniforms, and for many years a vast amount of pride was taken in this engine and its company.

In 1875 a steam fire-engine was purchased, the "Laconia," also a new hose-carriage and a hook-and-ladder truck. In this year the present companies were organized as follows: Laconia Steam Fire-Engine Company, No. 1, Reliance Hose Company, No. 1, and Laconia Hook-and-Ladder Company, No. 1. The Fire Department now has two engine-houses, about a dozen large reservoirs and other property, valued at nearly fifteen thousand dollars.

Fire-Alarm Telegraph.—The fire-alarm telegraph was introduced in Laconia by Frank H. Champlin. The sum of one thousand dollars was raised in March, 1876, and the apparatus was manufactured by F. H. Champlin and O. L. Andrews. There are at present about ten miles of wire connected with forty six-inch gongs in the dwellings of the firemen, and a twelve-inch gong on Gove's Block, on Main Street. Twenty-four signal-boxes are distributed throughout the precinct.

At a meeting of the legal voters of the Meredith Bridge Fire Precinct, held at the Universalist Church

(on Lake Street), on Saturday, September 22, 1849, it was voted to adopt an act making further provision for the extinguishment of fires. Nathan B. Wadleigh was chosen chief engineer, with Alvah Tucker, Charles Ranlet, I. E. Brown, James S. Hoyt, Charles Lane, J. F. Clough, E. Mallard, John T. Coffin, A. Warren and T. D. Whipple, assistant engineers.

The sum of one thousand dollars was voted for the purchase of a fire-engine and other necessary apparatus.

First Fire-Engine.—Stephen Perley was appointed a committee to go to Boston and purchase the engine. By his bill to the precinct we find that the sum of two hundred and seventy dollars was paid for the machine. Seventeen dollars was charged for hauling the "tub" to Meredith Bridge, and the precinct also paid eight dollars, one-quarter of Mr. Perley's expenses. The committee appointed to locate an engine-house reported in favor of building on the court leading to the burying-ground (on Water Street, where the engine buildings are now located). It was first kept in Avery mill-yard.

Laconia's Libraries.—The Meredith Bridge Social Library was started in 1803. The first meeting was held February 14th, when Jeremiah H. Woodman presided, Daniel Avery acted as clerk and Simeon Taylor, J. H. Woodman and Richard Boynton were chosen a committee to draft a constitution. They reported, April 25th, a constitution of twenty-seven articles. The annual meetings were to be held the last Monday in December, at five P.M., in the hall at Mrs. Deborah Sanborn's tavern. Members were to pay an entrance fee of two dollars and an annual assessment of fifty cents. No professional books, in law, physic or divinity, could be purchased at the expense of the proprietors. The officers were moderator, clerk, librarian and three directors; and the library was to be open each Saturday from three to six P.M. At the first annual meeting, in December, 1803, the membership was reported to be thirty and the amount expended for books was $83.47, the largest amount reported in any one year, the average sum being less than thirty dollars. In 1805 only $13.55 was used in buying books, but Lieutenant Stephen Perley was paid eight dollars for covering books with sheepskin.

The library was incorporated in 1807, and Stephen Perley and David Avery called the first meeting of the corporation. John Burleigh was elected moderator, John A. Harper clerk, Simeon Taylor, J. A. Harper and Dr. Zadock Bowman directors and Daniel Avery librarian. The fee for membership was advanced from three dollars to $9.50 in 1806, $4.25 in 1810, and to six dollars in 1826. In 1811 the librarian was authorized to sue as many as he thought proper of those who were delinquent in dues and fines for six months. The result was that forty-one dollars was expended for books that year instead of nothing, as the year before. It was also voted to enlarge the book-case or get a new one, to buy the "History of England" and make a catalogue. The records do not state how many volumes there were, but a copy of the catalogue was ordered to be hung in the library-room.

There were twenty-three members to meet at the annual meeting in 1818. Those who were delinquent for three years were expelled, and once more the "History of England" was ordered, but two or three years seem to have slipped away before it was obtained. In 1820 the library subscribed for the North American Review, which was continued for several years. In 1821 we have the only record of the books actually purchased in one year. They cost twenty-five dollars, and consisted of the North American Review, Federalist, "Delano's Voyages," "President's Hour," "Gazetteer of the Bible," "My Friend's Family," "Watts on the Mind" and "Schoolcraft's Tours."

In 1826, Rev. Francis Norwood was given one share while he remained in town. In 1831, Rev. John K. Young was allowed the use of Butterworth's "Concordance of the Bible" from the time he took it from the library until otherwise ordered by the proprietors, and he was also given a share in the library. Conveyances of shares are recorded with all the formality which attends the transfer of real estate, and the records show the names of nearly all the leading men in Meredith, Gilford and Gilmanton.

In 1836 an attempt was made to create a new interest in the enterprise, and it was proposed to bring in twenty new members at four dollars apiece, if so many could be found. But the attempt seems to have been a failure, for in 1837 the record ends very abruptly. At that time S. C. Lyford was president; J. T. Coffin, Sr., clerk; Otis Beaman, librarian; Daniel Tucker, G. L. Sibley and Francis Russell, directors.

We do not find that the yearly accounts ever rose as high as ninety dollars, and there is a prudence and carefulness shown in looking after small items that is positively ludicrous. For instance, the record for 1813 shows that there is $1.38 in Dr. Bowman's hands, twenty-three cents due from the librarian, and $1.67 from J. A. Harper. The same items are reported due in 1815, and in 1816, Dr. Bowman still stands charged with $1.38, and the estate of J. A. Harper with $1.67. We do not see that the Harper estate ever paid. The Bowman item appears in 1817 and then drops out.

In the thirty-four years covered by the records the whole amount expended for books could not have been but little more than what the town of Laconia annually appropriates for the public library; and yet it is plain the Social Library furnished more or less reading for the most intelligent families living within several miles of the "Bridge."

The library was for some years kept in the Avery store, and some of our older citizens remember to have seen it there. They all speak of it as a small affair, almost insignificant when compared with some of the private libraries which may now be seen here. The late John T. Coffin had the care of it for many years, and it was located in the rooms of the Meredith Bridge Savings-Bank. During its later years it seems to have been unused and neglected, and was practically unknown and forgotten to all but a few of the surviving proprietors.

It went through the fire of 1846 in safety and met its fate in the big fire of 1860. Mr. John T. Coffin was among the very last to see it. He tells us that it was in a case some eight feet long and six feet high, and stood in the bank-room. By dint of hard work, all the other property of value was carried out and the library case was moved toward the door. But he could not obtain sufficient help to carry it out before the flame broke into the room, and so he was forced to leave the old relic to make his own escape through a back-door; and this was the end of the Meredith Bridge Social Library fifty-seven years after its organization. With it there went many old papers which would have been of priceless value to the future historian of the town, and if the old volumes had been spared, there are many besides the antiquarian book-worm who would have enjoyed themselves in shaking the dust from the calfskin covers and examining the literature which our fathers read half a century ago.

The foregoing facts in regard to the first public library at Meredith Bridge were published in the Laconia Democrat in 1883, and were taken from a record-book then in the possession of the late Deacon F. W. Reeves, but since presented to the Laconia Public Library.

CHAPTER IV.

WEIRS AND LAKE WINNIPESAUKEE.

THE vicinity of Weirs, which lays just within the limits of Laconia and at the outlet of Lake Winnepesaukee, has been famous as a summer resort further back, probably, than the historical or traditional records exist. Long before the white men invaded New England, the Winnepesaukees, a branch of the Penacook tribe of Indians, maintained a permanent ahquedankenash, or fish-weir, at the outlet of the lake, and all the tribes in the vicinity would gather to participate in the spring and fall catch of shad. The weir was constructed by placing large boulders in an irregular line across the river at a proper distance from the outlet. The rocks were generally placed some ten feet apart, and a matting woven of twigs and tough bark was strung from rock to rock entirely across the stream, leaving a narrow opening in the centre of the weir, through which the fish must pass to enter the waters of Lake Winnepesaukee. When the shad would reach the weirs and crowd through the opening was the red man's harvest-time. The braves would man the canoes, and, paddling out among the struggling fish, with spear and dig-net would soon fill the boat to the water's edge and return to the shore to deliver the shad to the squaws. The fish were split open and cleaned, and either laid out to dry on flakes or hung up and smoked for winter use. This wholesale method of fishing was also indulged in to a certain extent by the early settlers, and as shad were plenty in those days, many loads were used to enrich the soil on the high ground in the vicinity of the river. The weir was constructed in a substantial manner and portions of it remained long after the mill-dams on the Merrimack had stopped the annual visitation of the shad; and now, although the Indian, the shad and the ahquedanken are among the things of the past in this vicinity, the name by which the locality was known still remains, and the Weirs is today one of the most popular summer resorts in New Hampshire. Until within a few years, however, the place was simply known as the landing-place of the steamer "Lady of the Lake," in connection with the railroad.

The visitor to Weirs now will find three large hotels,—the Hotel Weirs, built by the late Captain W. A. Sanborn, for many years commander of the "Lady of the Lake;" the Lakeside, built by L. R. & G. W. Weeks; and the Winnicortte, built by D. S. Doolittle. Besides these are many less pretentious places of resort, and in the grove near the wharf are numerous cottages of all grades, neatly laid out along the avenues. Opposite the passenger station is the permanent encampment of the Veteran Association of New Hampshire, who held their first reunion here in 1879. These reunions are held every year and generally last three days, calling together thousands of New Hampshire's veteran soldiers, many of them coming from far distant States to attend the gathering. Large and substantial buildings have been erected, which serve as barracks, regimental headquarters, dining-rooms, officers' headquarters, etc.

In the grove, nearer the lake, the Methodists, Unitarians and various other societies hold an annual gathering. An annual New England musical festival was also established in 1884.

Lake Winnepesaukee lies in the counties of Belknap and Carroll, and is very irregular in form. Its area, exclusive of two hundred and seventy-four islands, is upwards of seventy-one square miles and the distance around its shores is one hundred and eighty-two miles. It is about twenty-five miles long and varies from one to seven miles in width. There are ten islands, each having an area of more than one hundred acres, and one (Long Island) having an area of over one thousand acres. At the west end the lake is divided into three large bays, at the north is a fourth and at the east end there are three others. The waters descend four hundred and seventy-two feet on their way to the Atlantic, forming a rapid river of the same name as the lake, and emptying into the Merrimack. The waters of the lake, are so clear that the fish which abound in it can be seen playing among the stones at the depth of many feet.

While Lake Winnipiseogee is distinctively a mountain lake, yet it lacks almost all those wild, rough features of mountain scenery that usually characterize inland lakes in mountainous regions. The shore, seen from a distance, appears, as it is, comparatively smooth and level, but the mountains rise high on all sides. The islands which dot its surface are covered with vegetation and are generally neither rocky nor precipitous.

Steamboat Navigation.—The first steamboat ever operated on the lake was called the "Belknap," and was built by Ichabod Bartlett, a well-known lawyer, and Stephen C. Lyford, Esq., of Laconia. The keel was laid at Lake village in 1842, and the boat was finished early in the season of the next year, the launch taking place in June, 1833. The work of getting the boat through the channel at Weirs, into the lake proper, occupied nearly a week, the channel at that time being a shallow, turbulent stream, with many large boulders at the bottom, and was only navigable for very small boats with but little draught of water.

The master-mechanic of the "Belknap" was, at first, Charles Bell, of Weathersfield, Conn. Bell, however, was drowned, at Lake village, while pulling planks from the dam. He was succeeded by Harry Upton, who completed the boat. The first pilot was Perkins Drake, for many years well-known as a stage-driver between Centre Harbor and Laconia. Levi Cowdin was the first engineer. James Jewett was the captain of the "Belknap," and, consequently, the first commander of any steam craft to travel the waters of the lake.

The general make-up of the "Belknap," from its primitive nature, was rather unorth in appearance, and very much unlike any of our modern constructed boats, especially above the water-line. A striking peculiarity was her engine, of the horizontal pattern, of high pressure. The exhaust could be distinctly heard, in calm weather, a distance of ten miles. There were many different compartments all built upon the lower deck, like so many small houses. The pilot-house was a small, elevated "coop," the entrance being effected by a flight of stairs upon the outside. The ladies' and gents' cabin, captain's quarters, etc., were of small size and ill-shaped. The model of the hull was rather out of proportion, the width being greater in proportion to the length (ninety feet) than it ordinarily should be in boats of her size. The "Belknap" did not run but three or four years, being cast away upon a sand-bar near what is now Steamboat Island. From that event the island takes its present name. The mishap was caused by a misunderstanding on the part of the engineer. The "Belknap" was towing a large raft of timber from Centre Harbor to Alton Bay. It was in early spring-time, and the lake was very rough. Through some mismanagement, the boat was drifting toward the island with the fury of the wind and wave. The signal given to back the boat was understood by the engineer to be that for going forward, which resulted in the boat striking a sand-bar with such force as to be unable to get off. Subsequently the steamer "hogged," which opened several seams below the water-line, and she soon filled with water. Several unsuccessful attempts to get her off the bar were made, without effect, however, the last being on the Fourth of July of that year, when the efforts of forty men failed to move her, and she was left to her fate, and after removing her engine, boiler and iron-work generally, she finally went to pieces. Thus ended in disaster and evil forebodings the career of the pioneer steamboat on the lake. The "ribs" and other portions of the hull are still to be seen to-day upon the sand-bar where she went to pieces, and affords the curiosity-seeker an interesting object for investigation.

A few years afterwards a charter for the Winnepesaukee Steamboat Company was obtained through the Legislature, which resulted in the construction of the "Lady of the Lake," about the year 1848. This boat was designed to run between Weirs, Centre Harbor and other places about the lake. Her first captain was William Walker, of Lake village. Not long after, she fell into the hands of the B., C. & M. R. R., in whose interest she still remains. During her career she has undergone some changes, and suffered numerous tinkering from time to time, none of which have been more thorough and complete than the repairs made in the year 1882, when nearly a new hull was added, and extensive improvements were also made, both above and below the lower deck. At present she is regarded as being as staunch and fleet as at any time since the original construction. Since the days of Captain Walker she has been commanded by Eleazer Bickford, of Meredith, Stephen Cole, of Lake village, Winborn Sanborn and J. S. Wadleigh, of Laconia, the latter being her present captain. Her route during the season lies between Weirs, Centre Harbor and Wolfeborough, several trips being made daily in connection with the time-table of the Boston and Lowell Railroad at Weirs.

Next on the list came the "Long Island," built by Perley R. & George K. Brown, of Long Island, with a carrying capacity of about one hundred passengers. This boat was designed for general commerce about the lake, and is still in existence.

About this time Langdon Thyng constructed the "Jenny Lind" (at first a horse-boat) at Lake village, whose carrying capacity was about the same as that of the "Long Island."

This brings us down to the building of the "Red Hill," by the "Red Hill Steamboat Company," at Lee's Mills, in Moultonborough, with Allen Bumpus as her captain. This boat was of a rather unorth architecture, and built for the trade between the "Mills" and Alton Bay. The hull of this boat was modeled something like that of a scow. She was very laborious in her movements. The "Red Hill" was finally sent "up in a balloon" one fine day, by the bursting of her boiler. Remnants of her hull can still be seen on the shore at Alton Bay, just below the bridge that crosses the Merry Meeting River. Charles Brown, of Lake village, next came out with the "Nautatuck," afterward sold to Sweet & Morrison, of Wolfeborough, which is still in existence, though a little the worse for wear. About this time William Gaptil, of Wolfeborough, built the "Dolly Dutton." Both the last-named boats had a carrying capacity of about one hundred passengers. We have next to speak of the "Seneca," of about the same size as the two boats named which finally went ashore on the "Goose Egg," a dangerous rock on the Moultonborough "coast," which terminated fatally, and the end came. Uriah Hall was her captain, residing at Melvin village. Hall subsequently constructed the "Ossipee," a similar craft, another specimen of the laboring craft. Ansel Lamprey built the "Gazelle" at Tuftonborough, a little later on, which subsequently came into the possession of Dearborn Haley.

In those days came the introduction of the steam yachts, such as the "Pinafore," "Nellie," "Bristol," etc., the "Nellie" being the first propeller ever introduced to the waters of the lake. The "Nellie" was originally a steam launch and used at Portsmouth, from whence she was taken to the lake by George Duncan. Soon after she became the property of Dearborn Haley, at Wolfeborough. Later on she was owned by a Mr. Waldron, at Farmington, but still remained in the lake, being used by the summer boarders at the Winnepesaukee House, at Alton Bay, under the management of A. O. Phillips & Co. A few years previous to this epoch came the "Union." Captain John Tabor, of Wolfeborough, a craft with eminent renown and always a constant attendant at the Alton Bay camp-meetings in their early stages. The "Mayflower," built at Wolfeborough, with several owners, put in an appearance about this time as a freight-boat more particularly, did good service, and was quite a favorite with small excursion parties to different parts of the lake.

At the time of the completion of the "Cocheo Railroad," some thirty-five years since, between Dover and Alton Bay, it became advisable to open communication with the various towns which lined the shores of different parts of the lake, and for that purpose a steamer was constructed at Alton Bay called the "Dover." This was about the year 1852. Captain Winborn Sanborn, of Gileford, was her first captain. Augustus Wiggin, of Tuftonborough, at that time acted as captain's clerk, and some time afterward the "clerk" became the captain. Owing to some oversight in the location of the Dover's engine and boiler when placed in her native element, she settled at the bow, and large quantities of stone were placed in the stern to counteract that influence and make her assume a natural position in the water. Later on it became necessary to increase her size, and an addition of about twenty feet was made in the centre. Thorough repairs were made otherwise, and her name changed to the "Chocorua," with Captain Wiggin still master. The "Chocorua" did good service for several years, but it soon became necessary to have a new boat, and the present "Mount Washington" was constructed. This was about 1872. Captain Wiggin assumed command, and with a popular notion of "what to do and how to do it," has succeeded in making his route one much sought after by tourists and pleasure-seekers. The "Mount," as she is familiarly termed, is a model of neatness and workmanship, and said to be the fastest boat on the lake. Following the advent of the "Mount Washington," the "Chocorua" lay in the dock at Alton Bay that season, and underwent the process of "decomposition" to a certain extent. The apartments composing her upper decks were sold to various parties thereabouts, principally those connected with the camp-meeting association, and utilized for lodging-rooms, being located mostly about the vacant space near the passenger depot. The pilot-house was secured by "Aunt Mary" Ryan, of the "Alton Bay Cottage," who set it up on the lawn for a sort of a summer house, or "lover's retreat."

The first horse-power craft ever on the lake was built and owned by Captain David Parsons in 1838, at Long Island. About the year 1875, Dearborn Haley, of Wolfeborough, built the "Maid of the Isles," a propeller, with an engine of one hundred and twenty horse-power, and capable of carrying five hundred passengers. The "Maid" was of a very fine model, with upper and lower decks, and calculated to be very fast. 'Tis said that her owner intended that she should be a sort of "mediator" between the "Lady" and "Mount." She was used only a part of two seasons, and subsequently lay "moored" in the "offing" near Wolfeborough, until last season, when her cable-chain wore a hole through her hull below the water line and she sank. She was raised afterwards and towed to a position on the back side of Long Island, where she lies at present in her wonted useless condition. She is said to have cost about twenty thousand dollars. The failure of this craft was due to her immense draught of water, which was about seven and a half feet. Her captain was Anson Lamprey, of Long Island. Since that time has come to "Mineola" a fine little steam yacht; the "Maud S.," of South Wolfeborough; the "Gracie," of Meredith village; the "Undine" and "Laconia," of Lake village; and several other crafts of this class, as among the batch of steam-yachts.

The "James Bell" was built and owned by Messrs. Wentworth & Sweet, of Centre Harbor, in 1859, who some years since sold her to the B. C. & M. R. R., since which time she has been used as an excursion boat with headquarters at Lake village. Stephen Wentworth was her first captain. Clarence W. Adams, of Lake village, is her present captain. The "Bell" was thoroughly repaired during the summer of 1882, and is now regarded to be in first-class condition.

The "Winnepesaukee," Captain Robert Lamprey, Jr., formerly on the line between Lake village and Long Island, makes her headquarters at Tuftonborough and is run mostly for freighting purposes. This brings us down to the "Belle of the Wave," which was built at Long Island by Arthur H. Lamprey (a son of Uncle Robert). The "Belle" was a propeller, carried a forty horse-power engine and rated for one hundred and twenty-five passengers. Her model was perfect for attaining speed.

The "Belle" was burned at Long Island in the fall of 1884, and the next year was replaced with a larger and better boat of similar build, called the "Lamprey," and commanded by Captain George Lamprey.

Manufacturing Interests—Post-Office—Banks.

Manufacturing Interests.—GRANITE HOSIERY-MILLS.—The Granite Hosiery-Mills were established by the late John W. Busiel in 1847, and after the death of Mr. Busiel the business was continued by his sons, Charles A., John T. and Frank E., under the firm-name of John W. Busiel & Co. They manufacture men's, women's and children's hose, employing about one hundred and seventy-five hands. Their mills are built of brick, and are the best buildings for the purpose in the town.

WHITE MOUNTAIN MILLS.—Lewis F. Busiel, proprietor of the above-named mills, commenced business in Laconia in 1853, and at first only manufactured hosiery yarn. Machinery for the production of hosiery was added in 1855. Mr. Busiel is said to be the oldest living manufacturer (of power-loom production) in the country.

GILFORD HOSIERY COMPANY.—Incorporated in 1864. Capital stock, seventy-five thousand dollars. About one hundred and twenty-five hands are employed by this company in the manufacture of hosiery. Hon. John C. Moulton, the treasurer and largest owner in the corporation, is identified with the growth and prosperity of the town in a large measure, having taken a prominent part in nearly all the large enterprises.

PITMAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY.—Established by the late Joseph P. Pitman. Manufacture ladies' and children's hose. Employ about one hundred and fifty hands. Have been established in the mill they now occupy since 1875.

WINNIPESGOEE MILL.—In 1872, Mr. Frank P. Holt started in the paper box-making business in Laconia, with a capital of less than one hundred dollars. About five years later he went in company with Mr. James T. Minchin, under the firm-name of Minchin & Holt, and commenced the manufacture of underwear and hosiery. After three years Mr. Minchin retired, and the business has since been continued by Mr. Holt alone. About one hundred and seventy-five hands are employed. Annual product, one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

ABEL MACHINE COMPANY.—Established by the late William H. Abel. Manufacture all kinds of knitting-machinery and bobbin-winders. The Abel machines have a world-wide reputation, and are used in all parts of the United States and also in some foreign countries.

O'SHEA BROTHERS.—In 1875, Messrs. Dennis and John O'Shea, Jr., rented a small store on Bank Square and started in the dry-goods business. To-day the firm of O'Shea Brothers is one of the best known in New Hampshire, occupies the largest store and does a larger business than any other concern in the State.

LACONIA AND LAKE VILLAGE WATER-WORKS.—This organization was chartered by the Legislature of 1883. Capital, fifty thousand dollars. The first annual meeting was held June 1, 1885, and the following board of officers was elected: Clerk, J. W. Ashman; Treasurer, W. L. Melcher; Directors, John C. Moulton, W. L. Melcher, B. J. Cole, E. A. Hibbard, B. F. Drake, Gardner Cook, H. B. Quinby. John C. Moulton subsequently elected chairman of the board of directors. The pipes were laid in the summer of 1885 by N. W. Ellis & Co., of Manchester, N. H.

G. COOK & SON.—Gardner Cook, the senior member of this firm, established himself in the saw-mill and sash and blind business here in 1852. Some forty hands are now employed, and a large quantity of first-class work is produced annually. The entire factory was destroyed by fire in 1883, but immediately rebuilt.

MEREDITH COTTON AND WOOLEN COMPANY.—The first meeting of this company was called July 1, 1811, and the warrant for the meeting was signed by Stephen Perley, Daniel Tucker and John A. Harper. The shares of stock were issued and sold to the citizens of Gilford and Meredith, and was purchased of Stephen Perley and a large wooden mill erected on the site of the present Belknap brick mill. This was one of the first mills for the manufacture of cotton goods in the country. Considerable of the machinery was built in a machine-shop near by, operated by John Chase. The mill was not fairly in operation until 1813. Daniel Avery, a prominent citizen at that time, was the first agent, and accumulated considerable property and did much to advance the interests of the village.

CARDING-MILL.—About 1800 a carding-mill was established by Samuel & Nathan Bean on the lot now occupied by J. W. Busiel & Co. The building in which the business was carried on was torn down and replaced by Messrs. Busiel in 1882.

PAPER-MILL.—About 1800 a paper-mill was built on Mill Street by Aaron Martin. The rags were ground to a pulp with water-power, but most of the other labor was performed by hand, and a coarse paper was turned out until 1834, when the building was destroyed by fire.

BELL-FOUNDRY.—In 1810, George Holbrook, who served an apprenticeship in Boston with the famous Paul Revere of the midnight ride, established a bell-foundry at Meredith Bridge, near the site of the present Belknap Mill. The foundry was, of course, a small affair; sleigh-bells, door-knockers and church-bells were cast. In 1816 the concern was removed to Medway, Mass., where it is still in operation, and the Holbrook bells have a world-wide reputation. The bell now in use at the Belknap Mill was cast at the foundry in Meredith Bridge, and bears Holbrook's name and the date of casting.

In 1808, Daniel Tucker purchased land of Stephen Perley where the present mill of L. F. Busiel now stands, and erected the first machine-shop in Meredith Bridge. The shop was equipped with a small trip-hammer, forges, anvils, etc., and almost all tools used by farmers and carpenters were manufactured. Mr. Tucker lived in the small yellow house on Mill Street, opposite F. P. Holt's office, until 1813, when, having accumulated considerable property, he erected what is now known as the Mansion House in the rear of the Unitarian Church. When erected, this was the largest house and one of the best houses at the Bridge, and a handsome lawn extended in front of it to Main Street. Mr. Tucker went out of business in 1832, outside competition proving too much for the industry.

Postmasters.—Following is a list of the different postmasters and the date of their appointment up to the present time:

MEREDITH, STRAFFORD COUNTY, N. H.—Stephen Perley, April 1, 1805; Jonathan Ladd, July 1, 1807; Stephen Perley, July 13, 1813; John Langdon Perley, May 7, 1829; Stephen Perley, July 15, 1830. Discontinued February 22, 1833.

GILFORD, STRAFFORD COUNTY, N. H.—Horatio G. Prescott, April 3, 1824; Francis Russell, July 24, 1829; Hugh More, March 19, 1830; L. B. Walker, August 23, 1830; Jacob G. Foss, February 3, 1841; Benjamin Boardman, December 2, 1843; J. C. Moulton, July 31, 1845; Caleb P. Smith, June 25, 1849; Coryden W. Cook, December 6, 1850; Andrew C. Wright, November 7, 1851; Charles S. Gale, January 12, 1853; John C. Moulton, April 1, 1853. Changed to Laconia July 26, 1855; J. C. Moulton continued; S. W. Sanders, July 19, 1861; Joseph E. Oillin, October 1, 1861; Perley Putnam, 1874.

Tremont Hotel.—In 1810, Horatio G. Prescott erected a large building on the corner of Main and Lake Streets, as a tavern, known as the "Tremont." The building was three stories high and had one hundred and fifteen feet front on Main Street. The "Tremont" soon passed into the hands of Lyman B. Walker, Esq., and was destroyed by fire in 1872.

Laconia Savings-Bank was incorporated in 1831, as the Meredith Bridge Savings-Bank. Its first treasurer was John T. Coffin, who died in 1860, and whose portrait adorns the trustees' room at the present time. John T. Coffin, Jr., shortly afterward assumed the position. In 1864, Woodbury L. Melcher was elected treasurer, and remains such at this date. A portrait of Mr. Melcher's father, who was the president of the bank for many years, hangs upon the wall in the banking-room. In 1869 the name of the institution was changed to that of Laconia Savings-Bank. The first deposit was received March 27, 1832. The only one of the original members of the corporation now living is Dr. John L. Perley. Its assets amount to over eight hundred thousand dollars, with a surplus of over forty thousand dollars.

The present officers of the bank are Albert G. Folsom, president; W. L. Melcher, treasurer; Edmund Little, clerk; trustees, Daniel A. Tilton, Jas. S. Hoyt, Ellery A. Hibbard, Ebenezer Stevens, Almon C. Leavitt, Samuel B. Smith, Noah L. True, W. L. Melcher.

LACONIA—(Continued).

MASONIC HISTORY.

Mount Lebanon Lodge, No. 32, A. F. and A. M., was chartered June 10, 1819; Lyman B. Walker, John Chase, Nathan Bean, charter members. The following were the first officers February 23, 1820: Jonathan Piper, W. M.; Benjamin Swasey, S. W.; John Burns, J. W.; Lyman B. Walker, Sec.

The first application received was from John Avery, February 23, 1820, and received his E. A. Degree March 29, 1820.

October, 1820.—Benjamin Swasey, W. M.; Aaron Martin, S. W.; Jonathan Piper, J. W.; Mark W. Piper, Sec.

October, 1821.—Aaron Martin, W. M.; Jonathan Piper, S. W.; Lyman B. Walker, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

Received an act of incorporation June 27, 1822.

October, 1822.—Benjamin Swasey, W. M.; John T. Coffin, S. W.; Stephen P. Tolman, J. W.; Francis Russell, Sec.

May, 1824.—John T. Coffin, W. M.; John Avery, S. W.; Amos Smith, J. W.; Francis Russell, Sec.

May, 1825.—John T. Coffin, W. M.; Francis Russell, S. W.; Amos Smith, J. W.; James Molineux, Sec.

May, 1826.—Francis Russell, W. M.; Benjamin Swasey, S. W.; John Avery, J. W.; James Molineux, Sec.

May, 1827.—Francis Russell, W. M.; James Molineux, S. W.; Jeremiah Avery, J. W.; Thomas Wilder, Sec.

May, 1828.—Aaron Martin, W. M.; James Molineux, S. W.; Jeremiah Avery, J. W.; Thomas Wilder, Sec.

May, 1829.—Francis Russell, W. M.; Benjamin R. Gilman, S. W.; John Avery, J. W.; William T. Coolidge, Sec.

May, 1830.—James Molinex, W. M.; Benjamin R. Gilman, S. W.; I. W. Mudgett, J. W.; W. T. Coolidge, Sec.

May, 1831.—Amos Smith, W. M.; Benjamin R. Gilman, S. W.; I. W. Mudgett, J. W.; Charles Morgan, Sec.

May, 1832.—Amos Smith, W. M.; Benjamin R. Gilman, S. W.; I. W. Mudgett, J. W.; Charles Morgan, Sec.

May, 1833.—Aaron Martin, W. M.; B. R. Gilman, S. W.; I. W. Mudgett, J. W.; Charles Morgan, Sec.

May, 1835.—L. B. Walker, W. M.; J. Elkins, S. W.; L. M. Barker, J. W.; D. H. Sanborn, Sec.

May, 1836.—Jeremiah Elkins, W. M.; Amos Smith, S. W.; Mark Chase, J. W.; D. H. Sanborn, Sec.

No meetings were held from May, 1836, to August 7, 1844.

August 7, 1844.—John T. Coffin, W. M.; Mark Chase, S. W.; James S. Hoitt, J. W.; Chas. Morgan, Sec.

May, 1845.—Francis Russell, W. M.; Mark Chase, S. W.; James S. Hoitt, J. W.; B. Boardman, Sec.

May, 1846.—Jeremiah Elkins, W. M.; B. Boardman, S. W.; J. S. Hoitt, J. W.; Charles Morgan, Sec.

May, 1847.—Francis Russell, W. M.; J. S. Hoitt, S. W.; Samuel Winkley, J. W.; N. P. Burdham, Sec.

April, 1848.—Francis Russell, W. M.; James S. Hoitt, S. W.; Samuel Winkley, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1849.—Francis Russell, W. M.; Samuel Winkley, S. W.; Amory Warren, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1850.—Francis Russell, W. M.; Samuel Winkley, S. W.; John Brown, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1851.—Jeremiah Elkins, W. M.; John Brown, S. W.; Elbridge E. Webster, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1852.—Jeremiah Elkins, W. M.; Elbridge E. Webster, S. W.; Benjamin R. Gilman, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1853.—James S. Hoitt, W. M.; Elbridge E. Webster, S. W.; Benjamin R. Gilman, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1854.—James S. Hoitt, W. M.; E. E. Webster, S. W.; B. R. Gilman, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1855.—Francis Russell, W. M.; James S. Hoitt, S. W.; B. R. Gilman, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1856.—Francis Russell, W. M.; Elbridge E. Webster, S. W.; James S. Hoitt, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1857.—Elbridge E. Webster, W. M.; Charles C. Clement, S. W.; J. S. Thing, J. W.; Ira F. Folsom, Sec.

April, 1858.—Elbridge E. Webster, W. M.; Charles C. Clement, S. W.; J. S. Thing, J. W.; Ira F. Folsom, Sec.

April, 1859.—Charles C. Clement, W. M.; J. S. Thing, S. W.; E. H. Blaisdell, J. W.; Thomas Wilder, Sec.

April, 1860.—Elbridge E. Webster, W. M.; John Aldrich, S. W.; C. P. S. Wardwell, J. W.; Thomas Wilder, Sec.

April, 1861.—John Aldrich, W. M.; C. P. S. Wardwell, S. W.; W. L. Melcher, J. W.; Thomas Wilder, Sec.

April, 1862.—John Aldrich, W. M.; W. L. Melcher, S. W.; Alpheus Dolloff, J. W.; Thomas H. Bell, Sec.

March, 1862.—Voted that the regular meetings in April, June, August, October, December and February be held at Lake village; and months of May, July, September, November, January and March at Laconia, for the year.

April, 1863.—Alpheus Dolloff, W. M.; W. L. Melcher, S. W.; Samuel E. Young, J. W.; Thomas H. Bell, Sec.

In 1863.—Took a lease of hall in Folsom's Block for ten years.

1864.—W. L. Melcher, W. M.; Samuel E. Young, S. W.; B. F. Peaslee, J. W.; John T. Coffin, Sec.

April, 1866.—E. E. Webster, W. M.; A. J. Thompson, S. W.; J. S. Crane, J. W.; E. B. Bell, Sec.

April, 1867.—Alpheus Dolloff, W. M.; E. B. Bell, S. W.; George E. Chase, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

April, 1868.—Ezra B. Bell, W. M.; George E. Chase, S. W.; J. G. Jewett, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

April, 1869.—Alpheus Dolloff, W. M.; J. C. Blake, S. W.; R. R. Somes, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

April, 1870.—Alpheus Dolloff, W. M.; I. P. Plummer, S. W.; Arthur Tucker, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

April, 1871-72.—I. P. Plummer, W. M.; D. S. Dinsmore, S. W.; G. B. Lane, J. W.; W. F. Knight, Sec.

April, 1873.—D. S. Dinsmore, W. M.; J. B. Hendley, S. W.; H. B. Quimby, J. W.; George L. Mead, Sec.

April, 1874.—D. S. Dinsmore, W. M.; W. H. Jones, S. W.; E. C. Covell, J. W.; George L. Mead, Sec.

April, 1875.—D. S. Dinsmore, W. M.; W. H. Jones, S. W.; E. C. Covell, J. W.; F. H. Champlin, Sec.

1876-77.—W. H. Jones, W. M.; E. C. Covell, S. W.; Isaac Fonda, J. W.; F. H. Champlin, Sec.

1878.—E. C. Covell, W. M.; I. Fonda, S. W.; K. D. Sawyer, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

1879.—Edgar C. Covell, W. M.; Isaac Fonda, S. W.; B. Frank Drake, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

James C. Houston

1880.—Isaac Fonda, W. M.; John B. Hendley, S. W.; M. M. Robinson, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

1881.—Isaac Fonda, W. M.; Mark M. Robinson, S. W.; John G. Jewett, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

1882-83.—Mark M. Robinson, W. M.; John G. Jewett, S. W.; Edgar A. Rowe, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

1884.—John G. Jewett, W. M.; Kendrick D. Sawyer, S. W.; Edgar A. Rowe, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

1885.—Kendrick D. Sawyer, W. M.; Edgar A. Rowe, S. W.; Stephen S. Jewett, J. W.; George B. Lane, Sec.

The first meeting of Mount Lebanon Lodge, No. 32, was held in the house now occupied by L. F. Busiel, on Pleasant Street; afterwards a hall was fitted up in the Williard Hotel; then to what was called the office building of L. B. Walker, on Main Street; then to the hall on land now occupied by them till the fire in 1860, when meetings were held alternately at Lake village and this place; after Mr. Folsom built the present block the lodge was permanently located again.

Pythagorean Council, Royal and Select Masters, No. 6, was instituted at Sanbornton Square in 1830; after working a few years became dormant; in 1870 it was revived and removed to Laconia with the following charter members: Charles Lane, A. J. Thompson, Alpheus Dolloff, John P. Smith, Jr., George B. Lane, Hazen Copp, Fred. H. Coffin, John C. Blake, B. F. Peaslee, C. P. S. Wardwell, Francis Russell, Ezra B. Bell, A. H. Busiel, G. A. Copp, E. J. Dinsmore, C. H. Fullerton, J. L. Flanders, Isadore Fox, Jewell Gove, E. W. Gourd, E. C. Hasink, W. H. Jones, J. P. Plummer, R. R. Somes, C. A. Sanborne, K. D. Sawyer, H. P. Smith, George R. Somes and E. E. Webster.

The following is a list of the officers of Pythagorean Council from its organization in 1870 to 1886:

1870.—Charles Lane, T. I. M.; Andrew J. Thompson, D. M.; Alpheus Dolloff, P. C. of Work.

1871.—Andrew J. Thompson, T. I. M.; Alpheus Dolloff, D. M.; I. P. Plummer, P. C. of Work.

1872.—Alpheus Dolloff, T. I. M.; George B. Lane, D. M.; I. P. Plummer, P. C. of Work.

1873.—I. P. Plummer, T. I. M.; George B. Lane, D. M.; W. H. Jones, P. C. of Work.

1874.—George B. Lane, T. I. M.; W. H. Jones, D. M.; K. D. Sawyer, P. C. of Work.

1875.—George B. Lane, T. I. M.; F. R. Gammon, D. M.; B. W. Crosby, P. C. of Work.

1876.—Frank R. Gammon, T. I. M.; George A. Hatch, D. M.; Frank H. Champlin, P. C. of Work.

1877.—George A. Hatch, T. I. M.; Frank H. Champlin, D. M.; George R. Somes, P. C. of Work.

1878-79.—Frank H. Champlin, T. I. M.; Charles M. Elkins, D. M.; George E. James, P. C. of Work.

1880.—Charles M. Elkins, T. I. M.; John R. Champlin, D. M.; W. H. Jones, P. C. of Work.

1881.—W. H. Jones, T. I. M.; John R. Champlin, D. M.; Frank H. Champlin, P. C. of Work.

1882.—K. D. Sawyer, T. I. M.; E. J. Dinsmore, D. M.; G. H. Everett, P. C. of Work.

1883.—K. D. Sawyer, T. I. M.; G. H. Everett, D. M.; C. E. Frye, P. C. of Work.

1884-85.—George H. Everett, T. I. M.; C. E. Frye, D. M.; S. S. Jewett, P. C. of Work.

John L. Perley, Jr., Post, No. 37, G. A. R., was chartered November 30, 1877, with the following charter members: W. H. Piper, D. H. Lewis, John F. Baker, A. H. C. Jewett, James Collins, Jr., Jackson H. Lawrence, P. H. Rowen, Edward C. Ryan, Winslow O. Whipple, William Goulding, Bernard Mulligan, Charles W. Baldwin, D. A. H. C. Jewett, S. M. S. Moulton, A. J. Farrar, H. L. Wilkinson, M. B. Plumber, George B. Lane, D. B. Nelson, John L. Bachelder.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. JOHN CARROLL MOULTON.

The first historic mention of the Moulton family is in the "Doomsday" Book, compiled in 1086. This shows the Moultons to be of Norman origin, and to have accompanied William the Conqueror in his invasion and conquest of England, 1066. The following concerning the early history of the family and description of coat-of-arms is furnished by John T. Moulton, of Lynn: "Thomas de Multon was a favorite of Richard Cœur de Lion (1199). He is called 'Lord of Gillesland,' in Cumberland, and by the Normans 'Lord de Vaux.' Sir Walter Scott introduces him as such in the 'Talisman.' He is probably the same Thomas de Multon who, as one of the barons, signed Magna Charta, in 1215. Thomas de Multon, doubtless a grandson of the first Thomas, was also a signer of the Great Charter of Edward, in 1297. They were Lords of Egmont, in Cumberland, Multon Hall, in Wilberton, now in ruins, was once the property of Sir Thomas. Dugdale says: 'Acre was an old hospital for poor people, dedicated to St. Leonard, which, being given with the manor, A.D. 1230, to the Knights Hospitalers by Sir Thomas Multon, Knight, etc.' Prior to 1571 the Moultons bore arms with devices differing somewhat in minor details, yet alike in the main. The following is the description of the arms granted in 1571: Moulton—Argent; three bars; gules, between eight escallop-shells, sable; three, two, two and one. Crest on a pellet, a falcon rising Argent."

As many as seven Moultons were in America at a very early date, one in the Jamestown, Va., settlement. In 1635, John and Thomas Moulton emigrated from Norfolk County, England, to Newbury, Mass. They came to Hampton, N. H., in 1638, and their names appear on the list of the first settlers. John Moulton (1) was born in England about 1599; married Anne —. Their children were Henry, Mary, Anna, Jane and Bridget (twins), John and Ruth. He was a man of note, and, in 1639, was a representative to the General Court. John (2), born in Newbury in 1638, married Lydia, daughter of Anthony Taylor, also one of the earliest settlers of Hampton. John (2) was a "Lieutenant." The children were Martha, John, Lydia, Daniel, James, Nathan, David, Anna, Lydia, Jacob and Rachel. Jacob (3), born 1688, married Sarah Smith, December 10, 1714. He died in 1751, and his wife in 1739. Children: Sarah, Lydia, Nathan, Dorothy, Jonathan and John.

General Jonathan Moulton (4) was born in 1726, and died in 1788. He was representative to the General Court in 1755-58; was distinguished for his energy and enterprise, and rendered valuable service in the Indian wars. When thirty-seven years old, in 1763, the town of "Moultonborough" was granted to him and sixty-one others by the Masonian proprietors. He had great foresight and shrewdness. The following amusing incident of the way in which he obtained the grant of land now known as the town of New Hampton is characteristic: "Having a very fine ox weighing fourteen hundred pounds, fattened for the purpose, he drove him to Portsmouth as a present to Governor Wentworth. He refused any compensation, but said he would like a charter of a small gore of land he had discovered adjoining Moultonborough. The Governor granted this simple request, and General Moulton called it New Hampton in honor of his native town. This small gore of land contained nineteen thousand four hundred and twenty-two acres, and a part now constitutes Centre Harbor." In July, 1774, General (then Colonel) Moulton was one of the four delegates to the Provincial Congress, at Exeter, to choose delegates to the Continental Congress. His title of general was gained in the Revolution, where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1777 he was stationed at Saratoga. Energetic, and a born leader of men, General Moulton did much to forward the settlement and build up the region adjacent to the lake on the north, and absolutely created the three towns of Moultonborough, New Hampton and Centre Harbor. Among the children by his first wife, Abigail Smith, was Benning (5), who was born May 21, 1761. He married, November 7, 1782, Sally Leavitt, and settled in Centre Harbor in 1783, where he died December 23, 1834. They had six children,—Nancy (married Jonathan Moulton), Jonathan S., Thomas L., Benning, John H. and Elizabeth (Mrs. Daniel Hilton). Jonathan Smith (6) was born at Centre Harbor December 14, 1785. He married Deborah Neal, and died November 15, 1855. He was a large farmer and also was quite extensively engaged in merchandising.

Mrs. Moulton is now living with her son, John C., at the advanced age of ninety-seven, in the full possession of her faculties.

Hon. John Carroll Moulton (7), son of Jonathan Smith and Deborah (Neal) Moulton, was born at Centre Harbor, N. H., December 24, 1810. His district-school education was supplemented by an attendance of several terms at Holmes' Academy, Plymouth, N. H., then in charge of that famous educator, Samuel Burns. Evincing an aptitude for mathematics, he availed himself of the instruction of "Master Dudley Leavitt," the astronomer and mathematician, whose fame was almost world-wide. Under this tuition he developed rapidly a great proficiency in this branch of science, which has been of valuable assistance to him. In vacation-time he assisted his father in all branches of his extensive business. And so he attained manhood, acquiring a strong physique by labor among the rocks and hills, and a mental discipline of more than ordinary quality formed as acute and powerful a mind. He commenced active life by entering into trade at Sandwich, but in a few months removed his business to Centre Harbor, and, in 1833, opened a hotel in that place, and continued both as merchant and landlord. This hotel met with great approval, and was the pioneer of the numerous and elegant hostelries of that attractive summer resort. In 1836 he changed his residence to Lake village, and engaged in merchandising and manufacturing. In 1841 he removed to Meredith Bridge (now Laconia), and from that time he has been one of the formative and directing forces of the progress of this flourishing place,—first, as landlord of the popular "Belknap Hotel"; next, as bookseller and druggist; then as postmaster of the lively village, appointed by President Tyler. He continued in this office, being reappointed by President Polk, for about six years, when, under the Whig administration of Taylor, he was deemed an "offensive partisan" and removed. He was again appointed by Frank Pierce, continued in office by Buchanan, but shortly after Lincoln's accession to the Presidency he was succeeded by a Republican. This long term of service—sixteen years—is the strongest proof of his popularity.

In 1861, Mr. Moulton became a partner in the large freight-car manufactory which had been conducted at Laconia by Charles Ranlet & Co., until Mr. Ranlet's death, in 1860. Giving his personal attention to the business, he rapidly developed a large and profitable industry. The works have been frequently enlarged, extensive buildings put up, and the quality of work advanced until passenger-cars of the finest style were manufactured here and the "Laconia Car Company" had a national reputation. This gave employment to hundreds of workmen, the pay-roll amounting to eight thousand dollars per month. The entire plant was destroyed by fire in February, 1881. With characteristic energy, Mr. Moulton began work on new buildings before the ruins were cold, and work was resumed in the new factory in less than a month. This was done by Mr. Moulton when men at his advanced age and with his ample fortune would have retired from active life and its responsibilities.

His persevering nature was turned, in 1865, to the establishment of a bank to accommodate the financial needs of the business interests so largely increasing in Laconia and its vicinity. In obtaining a charter for a national bank, he had to meet and overcome "almost insurmountable obstacles;" but his labors resulted, however, in the securing the charter for, and the founding of, the "Laconia National Bank." He was at once elected to its presidency, which he still retains. In 1868 he became the sole owner of the "Gilford Hosiery Corporation," which furnishes employment to many operatives, mostly females, and does a most prosperous business, the annual product having been as high as one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. Mr. Moulton, with Benjamin E. Thorston, owns the extensive flour and grain-mill at Laconia. In other and widely varying ways has Mr. Moulton contributed greatly to the improvement, growth and prosperity of Laconia, and he is, beyond cavil, one of the ablest financiers of this section of the State. Sterlingly Democratic in his principles, he represented the Sixth District in the State Senate in 1871 and 1872, and was elected a member of the Governor's Council in 1874. He was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention in 1876, and a candidate for Presidential elector on the Tilden ticket.

Mr. Moulton is a charter member of Winnepesaukee Lodge of Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, which was founded at Laconia in 1842, and is now one of the Uniformed Patriarchs of the order.

He married, July 15, 1833, Nellie B., daughter of Samuel M. Senter. Her ancestor, Colonel Joseph Senter, was one of the first settlers of Centre Harbor. They had five children,—Edwin C., deceased, an active business man; Samuel M. S., connected intimately with his father's extensive business operations; William H., died young; Horatio F., superintendent of a hosiery-mill at Columbia, S. C.; and Ida L. (Mrs. Joshua B. Holden), who resides in Boston. Mrs. Moulton died November 18, 1869, and Mr. Moulton married, August 18, 1866, Sarah A. McDougall, a lady of estimable qualities and generous character.

Mr. Moulton has had no small share in all the prominent business enterprises of the lake region for the last half century. Faithful in the discharge of official duties, far-seeing, bold, persistent, he deserves and has won a success far beyond the hopes and aspirations of his early manhood. Unlike many men of wealth, he gives with a liberal hand to all things tending to advance the financial, educational and moral interests of the people with whom he has been so long connected.

His benefactions in behalf of liberal Christianity have always been marked. The organization of the Unitarian Society of Laconia was accomplished largely by his active energy, and its church owes its erection, in a great measure, to his labors and financial aid. He is also one of the most generous of its supporters. Pleasing in his intercourse, a strong and powerful friend, he possesses qualities which endear him to a large circle, who esteem him for his worth. He has the satisfaction of seeing his children filling honorable and useful positions in business circles and society, and worthy descendants of a noble ancestry.

COLONEL SELDON CROCKETT.

Seldon Crockett, son of Samuel and Sarah (Wilcomb) Crockett, was born in Meredith (now Laconia), N. H., October 9, 1801, and died June 14, 1868, at his birthplace, aged sixty-four years.

His grandfather, Captain Joshua Crockett, was a native of Newburyport, Mass., who, according to the family tradition, came, when a young man, with six others, to Meredith (then New Salem) to avail themselves of the government grant of fifty acres of land to each settler, with the privilege of purchasing as many more as he might desire at the nominal price of fifty cents per acre. They camped on what is since known as "Cotton's Hill." The wild appearance of the country discouraged five of the number, and the next morning they abandoned the enterprise. The others, Colonel Ebenezer Smith and Captain Crockett, selected their future homes from the top of a tall pine-tree, Captain Crockett choosing the land between Winnisquam Lake and Round Bay, "so he could have it fenced by water on two sides." On this location he cut trees, cleared enough land to plant a few potatoes he had brought on his wearisome way, and erected a log cabin—the first dwelling "within an area of forty miles." This occupied the site of the present summer residence of Mrs. Crockett. The next year Captain Crockett brought his mother to his new home and the battle with the wild and refractory forces of nature was commenced. For this Captain Crockett was especially well fitted. Possessed of a strong and active frame, of great energy and executive force, he enjoyed the labor and the life. He was a noted hunter of the various wild animals of the country, was captain of a company of riflemen raised for service in the Revolution and died aged seventy-three years.

His son, Samuel Crockett, born 1780, inherited a portion of the acres of his father, and, by his wife, Sarah Wilcomb, had a family of four boys and one girl. He was a highly-prized member of the Free-Will Baptist Church, and, with his pious wife, would go on horseback eight miles to the nearest religious services. She was a much-beloved and devoted Christian. Her faith in the efficacy of prayer was strong and unswerving, and many wonderful instances of marked answers to fervent petitions are handed down to the present generation. She was a most remarkable woman in many ways, and lived to the good old age of eighty-six, surviving her husband (who died in 1854) twelve years.

Seldon Crockett came of industrious ancestors, and was a worker from very early years. The common school, of a few months in each year, where he acquired his education, was the college of those days, and for the practical business life of active New England it did its work well. It made independent, clear-headed, self-reliant men, who could reason logically, and logically carry their conclusions into practical results. From the age of sixteen, when he left home, Seldon earned his living and gave of his earnings to help his parents. His seventeenth year was passed on a farm in Massachusetts, and fifty-eight of the sixty dollars received for his labor were given to his father. He afterward became a manufacturer of furniture in Boston, and, by his energy and industry, created a successful business.

In 1831, Mr. Crockett married Lucy, daughter of Thomas and Susan (Learned) Elliott, of Watertown, Mass. This union with a lady possessing the noblest qualities of the leading New England families, from whom she descended, proved most felicitous. She ably seconded all his labors, joined in his benefactions and was a prominent factor in his success. Their children are Seldon Frank, Sarah W. (Mrs. William W. Hague), Susan E. (Mrs. S. Stillman Blanchard), Grace H. (Mrs. J. L. Grandin) and Lucy E. (Mrs. S. A. Shannon).

But it is pre-eminently as the genial landlord, friend and host that Colonel Crockett is recalled to the memory of his numerous friends, or should appear in history for the perusal of coming generations. Disposing of his manufacturing, on account of ill health, in 1844 he became the proprietor of the "Bromfield House," in Boston, and until his death, a period of more than a quarter of a century, he conducted it with admirable ability, and many prominent citizens of New England made it their chosen place of resort.

During his long residence in Boston Colonel Crockett won the respect of all who knew him as a gentleman of kind spirit, courteous manners and undeviating uprightness. He was loyal to his friendships and to all his business relations. Not as demonstrative of his religious feelings as many others, he showed by his daily life that his mind and heart were under control of religious principle, and for years was a valued member of the Rowe Street Baptist Church, then under the pastorate of Rev. Baron Stow, D.D. Every one met Colonel Crockett with pleasure and parted from him with regret. His friends came voluntarily to him from the highest circles of political, business and social life, alike from city and country, and remained friends during life. He was most unassuming and non-obtrusive, yet the sterling worth of the man forced a recognition of his merits and an appreciation of his exalted character upon all with whom he came in contact; and, when a member of the Boston Common Council, the only position he would accept, he never took part in anything conducted for mere show, but was one of the working members, faithfully discharging his duties without ostentation or display. He ever had a warm sympathy for young men coming from the country to seek occupation in the city, and his nature went out to their aid in all ways, and many men of prominence owe their success to his kind interest and generous assistance. President Pierce once gave this advice to Colonel Thomas J. Whipple,— "You are going to Boston, colonel, and you may want a friend to advise and consult with. Now, if that time comes, go to Colonel Seldon Crockett, of the 'Bromfield House;' he is a safe and reliable man, and always ready to assist a friend; he is a good man to tie to."

The character of Colonel Crockett, the quality of his intimate friends and the esteem in which he was and is held can best be told by some of those friends, and, fortunately, their utterances are on record. We extract from the Boston Advertiser of April 8, 1869,—

"A number of gentlemen, who, for more than a generation, have enjoyed the hospitality of that famous hostelry the 'Bromfield House,' which is about to be removed before the progress of business enterprise, determined to hold a festive gathering in the old house before it should be closed, in order to revive the recollection of the many pleasant hours they had passed within its walls, and to testify their respect for the honored landlord of so many years—Colonel Seldon Crockett."

The committee of arrangements consisted of Hon. Marshall P. Wilder, the originator of the "gathering," Hon. George P. Sanger, Benjamin Callender, M. P. Kennard, James A. Dupee, P. H. Wentworth and A. K. Loring. Among the invited guests present were ex-President Pierce, Mayor Shurtleff, Rev. Drs. Hague and Stow, Hon. George S. Hillard, Hon. George P. Sanger, Judge Joel Parker, Judge C. Levi Woodbury, Hon. Peleg W. Chandler, Judge Burbank, of Lenox, George Lunt, Esq., and Hon. Richard Frothingham. We extract briefly from a few of the speeches.

Ex-President Pierce said:

"I have made this house my sojourning-place while in Boston for many years, and my knowledge of it and the noble man who presided over it is but a type of your own, and your appreciation of them is but a type of my own. I have been here through many and long years, and I can truly say, what I think can rarely be said by any of us of other places, that I have known not a single disagreeable association of a single memory that it is not pleasant to cherish."

Hon. Marshall P. Wilder:

"For more than a quarter of a century the 'Bromfield House,' under the administration of the Crocketts, has been celebrated for its quiet, well-regulated, home-like character; especially has it been noted for the excellence of its dinners, and it has long since passed into a proverb,— 'If you wish for a good dinner, go to the 'Bromfield House.' It is this which has made this house the resort of those who sought comfort rather than display. Around this hospitable board have sat Presidents of the United States, members of the Cabinet and Congress, Governors and Judges of our own and other States, and eminent men from the various professional, commercial and business walks of life; and who that has been an inmate of this house does not remember the cheerful smiles, the cordial grasp, the hearty welcome of the late Colonel Seldon Crockett—characteristics happily perpetuated in his worthy son—and who that has enjoyed the comforts and hospitalities of this house would not join with us in the language of Shennstone:

"Who'er has traveled life's dull round,
Where'er his stages may have been,
Will surely say, here have I found
The warmest welcome of an inn."

Hon. Peleg W. Chandler brought up the memories of his boyhood and his first visit to Boston. As a country lad, he called upon his wealthy uncle at the dinner hour, and when he came, in response to the announcement that "his nephew wished to see him," he asked Peleg what he wanted to do. "See Boston." "Of course; well, a good place to start from is Bowdoin Square," bade him "good-day, as his carriage was waiting," and he saw him no more. He had a letter of introduction to Colonel Crockett, who received him heartily, cordially entered into his plans, gave him his advice and hospitality and made him at home and among friends, and through his counsel he had become what he was. So warm, so encouraging, so lasting was this friendship that Mr. Chandler was feelingly eloquent when he spoke of the many excellent qualities of "his dear friend, Colonel Crockett."

We close this tribute to the memory of this most worthy Christian gentleman in the language of Colonel John G. Greene, of the Boston Post, at the time of Colonel Crockett's death:

"He was faithful to all the duties of life, and leaves a memory worthy of ardent emulation. Benevolent, confident, honorable in all business transactions, spirited and patriotic as a citizen, tender as a husband, parent and friend, he commanded undeviating respect."

DAVID S. PRESCOTT, M.D.

David S. Prescott, M.D., was born at Franklin, N. H., April 26, 1823, and died at Laconia February 25, 1874. He was a descendant of a family whose name is sufficient to command respect. Inheriting in a large measure some of the prominent characteristics of his ancestors, David was not content to pass his life quietly on the farm, and endowed with a heart full of glowing ambition and high aspirations, he desired an education which should enable him to achieve success in a larger and broader field of action. But his parents' circumstances did not afford him the advantages of liberal culture, and he was dependent on his own efforts for the means of acquiring the knowledge he sought, and with the courage and energy of an earnest boy, he took up the burden of life while very young and went to work in his father's saw-mill in order to earn money to go to school. But the brave lad's career was soon impeded by an accident, which appeared to blast his fond hopes of a bright future. His right hand was badly injured, leaving only the thumb and fore-finger, and David's first words to his father were, "I am ruined for life." However, he soon took heart again, and, with the encouragement and aid of his father, he found employment and succeeded in gaining sufficient money to carry on his studies. His preparatory medical education was pursued under the direction of Dr. L. M. Knight, of Franklin, N. H.; he was graduated at Dartmouth Medical College in 1849, commenced the practice of his profession January 1, 1850, at Temple, N. H., and removed to Laconia in 1853, where he married Mrs. Olive J. Knowles (widow of Dr. Knowles, of Laconia, and daughter of Jonathan and Betsey (Lawrence) Ladd), who survives him.

Dr. Prescott now addressed himself fully to the noble and self-denying labors of a medical man, and evinced great patience in the midst of the cares and trials of his profession. The difficulties, lack of means, ill health, etc., with which he had to contend in preparing for his life-work did not crush his spirit nor prevent his rising in the world. They only seemed to develop his manhood, to bring out those sterling qualities which constitute a truly noble character. He was peculiarly adapted to his work; his large and sympathetic heart was drawn toward suffering in any form, and his tender and gentle manner was restful to the sick. His interest in his patients was not merely professional; he was at once their friend, counselor and sympathizer in all trials, and his advice and pecuniary help, where needed, was given freely, and, although never of sound physique, his first and last thought was the comfort of others. Through his long and arduous career of service in his noble and humane profession it is not too much to say that, by untiring devotion to medical duty, by the constant care, patience, fidelity and skill in the daily exercise of a pursuit so important to humanity, he illustrated the best qualities of a physician, and won the respect, enduring love and gratitude of the community. Can any one doubt the popularity and success of such a man?

Politically, Dr. Prescott was a Democrat, and his object, first and last, the good of his country. He believed in party action, without being a partisan, and in all things followed the dictates of his judgment and conscience. When the emancipation proclamation was issued, he said: "Slavery is dead, and I thank God for it." He was a strong temperance advocate and an indefatigable worker in the cause; active in educational matters, and in all affairs of public interest he took an intelligent concern.

As a Christian worker, Dr. Prescott deserves especial mention. His earnestness and fervor awoke a response in every soul. He was a regular attendant of and participator in the prayer-meeting whenever his duties permitted. He was a natural leader in the church, the promoter and organizer of every benevolent movement and a most liberal contributor. His home, his time and his money were at the service of his Master; and, in alluding to his death, his pastor, Rev. Mr. Bacon, said, "In losing Dr. Prescott, I lose my right arm." Never did the Congregational Church of Laconia lose a more valued or efficient member.

If a Sabbath-school excursion was in contemplation, he looked up the children of the poor and arranged for them to attend at his expense; and in all church charities his customary words to the members were, "Put your hands in your pockets, and put them down deep;" and he enforced his words by personal example. His patients felt the sincerity and earnestness of his religious nature, and, to use the language of one, "he prescribed for body and soul." The magnetic influence of the man was wonderful, and showed itself alike in eloquent and burning oratory, captivating tones of song and vigorous personal endeavor.

Dr. Prescott was a wise, benevolent, conscientious, public-spirited man, whose example and influence were beneficent in all the relations of life, whose memory is gratefully cherished, and those who knew him will say that this is not the language of eulogy, but simple truth.

"Better than storied urn or animated bust" is such a monument of tender memories.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE GALE.

The annals of an honest, industrious and useful life are of more value as a lesson to coming generations than many of those which are placed high on the scroll of fame.

Napoleon Bonaparte Gale, son of Daniel and Abigail (Page) Gale, was born in Gilmanton (now Belmont) March 3, 1815. His grandfather was Stephen Gale, who married Susannah Flanders. Stephen Gale was born in Exeter in 1739. He moved to Raymond, where he owned and conducted a mill. He was one of the sturdy, patriotic men of that period to whom we of the present are so much indebted, and served as a soldier in the French and Indian War. He was stationed at Tioga, in the western part of New York, and did good and valiant service. When discharged, he was obliged to journey on his homeward way hundreds of miles on foot, through the trackless wilderness, exposed to cold and other perils, and for three days was entirely without food.

In 1780 he settled in Gilmanton, and gave the name "Tioga" to the place where he made his home, on account of its resemblance to the country where he served as a soldier, and that part of the town even yet bears the name he conferred upon it. He died September 10, 1813, having "served his day and generation well."

Daniel, son of Stephen and Susannah (Flanders) Gale, was born in Raymond April, 1775, and died October, 1845. He came to Gilmanton with his parents when he was five years old, and was ever after a resident there. He was a bright, intelligent boy, and improved his opportunities for education to the utmost, and became the schoolmaster of the town, which position he held with credit for over twenty-five years. He was, besides, in numerous ways, one of the influential men of the town, holding many offices of honor and trust. He was selectman for twenty years, justice of the peace for many years, representative to the General Court for several terms, and one of the associate judges of the Court of Sessions. He transacted much Probate business, and attended to the securing of Revolutionary claims and pensions. His nature was positive and energetic; his judgment sound and practical; his memory very retentive,—he could carry in his mind the locations and boundaries of all the farms in a large area, and his accuracy in this respect was so well known that when any dispute arose concerning boundaries, he was at once appealed to, and his decision was received as final. Kind-hearted and generous, he worked more for the good of others than for remuneration, and although, with the same opportunities, a cold, calculating man of the world would have become rich, Judge Gale was so only in the love and esteem of his fellow-townsmen. He was of large physique, well proportioned, over six feet high, weighing over two hundred pounds, and a very distinguished and fine-looking man. He married Abigail, daughter of Deacon Benjamin and Hannah (Sanborn) Page, of Epping. Their children attaining maturity were Hazen, Daniel M., Napoleon B. and Benjamin P. Mrs. Gale was born in 1779, and died in 1856, surviving her husband eleven years. She descended from two good colonial families, and was a thrifty, practical woman of strong executive powers, and impressed her individuality upon her children, and labored zealously that they might receive a good education. She was strongly orthodox in her opinions, and her father was a deacon in the Congregational Church.

Napoleon passed his early years with his parents, attending the town school and supplementing his education by attendance at Sanbornton and Gilmanton Academies. When eighteen years old his brother, Daniel M. (who had purchased the interest of his uncle Stephen in the mercantile house of "Gale & Pitman," doing business at Laconia and Lake village), offered him a position as clerk, which he accepted, and continued with the firm until 1835, when the store at Lake village was sold, and he returned to the home farm at Gilmanton.

In August, 1835, the young man, not having yet attained his majority, went to Boston, and engaged as clerk in a grocery-store, where he remained nearly four years, doing his duties faithfully, and every year adding to his mercantile knowledge. In 1839 he came to Meredith and, in company with Joshua R. Smith, engaged in merchandising under the name of "Smith & Gale." In the fall of 1840, on account of ill health, he removed to his father's house, and after the death of his father, in 1845, he assumed the care of the home farm.

In August, 1852, his health being re-established he went into the Belknap County Bank as a substitute for his brother, Daniel M., the cashier, who was ill, and was ever after connected with the bank. In No-

N. B. Gale

ember, 1853, he was elected cashier, and held that office until the expiration of the charter, in 1866, and the closing up of its affairs, some three years later.

In 1868 Mr. Gale was one of the incorporators of the Belknap Savings-Bank, and was one of the trustees. Upon the resignation of the presidency by Dr. Perley, Mr. Gale was elected president, and still holds the position. Politically, he is a Democrat, and represented the town of Belmont in 1867-68, and is one of the representatives of Laconia this present year (1885), of which place he is now a resident.

Major Gale, as he is universally called, carries his seventy years with the appearance of a much younger man; possesses great strength of character, can say yes when he means yes, and no when he means no, and is a model banker. He commenced by keeping the books, and knows all the details, and there is no need of an "expert" to "straighten out" the affairs of this bank while Major Gale, with his clear mind, is at the helm.

In a business career of over half a century his life has been one of unblemished integrity and conscientious uprightness. He is ever honest in all transactions,—not because honesty is the best policy, but because of his sound principles, which he never for one moment compromised. He has sought no means of obtaining wealth by any speculative or hasty methods, choosing rather to labor with untiring zeal and cheerful industry in his own field, in which he has won and deserved the confidence of the entire community.

Kind-hearted and generous, in all good causes he gives with a liberal hand, without ostentation and assumption. Public-spirited and enterprising, he advocates and promotes any effort for the improvement and betterment of this section. He is, in many ways, one of Laconia's representative men, and among the most honored of her citizens.

JOSEPH P. PITMAN.

Joseph P. Pitman, for more than fifty years an honored and influential citizen of what is now Laconia, descended from a family which had been long and favorably known in Belknap County.

Among the officers elected at the first town-meeting held in Meredith appears the name of the grandfather, Ebenezer Pitman, who was afterward made representative to the General Court, and served several years as town clerk. The confidence of his fellow-citizens was also bestowed upon the son, Ebenezer Pitman, Jr., who was likewise for a number of terms a representative to the General Court, and in various ways rendered valuable service to his own townsmen by virtue of his legal acquirements.

Joseph P. Pitman, second son of Ebenezer Pitman, Jr., was born on the old homestead in Meredith January 12, 1809. Passing his earlier days upon the farm, attending school as opportunity offered, he profited greatly by his advantages. But eager to know and quick to learn, he was not content with the instruction to be obtained at home, and therefore entered the academy at New Hampton, and made such progress that prior to his majority he has taught several terms of school, and had been a clerk for two years in Concord. At the age of twenty-one he began business in what is now Laconia, in connection with the late Daniel M. Gale, and subsequently continued it with his brother, John M. Pitman, afterward, for more than thirty years, with his intimate friend, Daniel A. Tilton, and from 1877 in company with his own son, Joseph W. Pitman. Mr. Pitman early acquired an enviable reputation as a successful business man of sound practical judgment, and was consequently selected to fill many positions of responsibility and trust. From 1836 to 1841 he was both agent and treasurer of the Winnepesaukee Lake Cotton and Woolen Manufacturing Company, and during a part of this time he was also engaged in business at Lake village, in company with the late John V. Barron. In 1842 he was made a director in the Winnepesaukee Bank, and rendered such essential service in the management of its affairs as to prevent its threatened failure.

During the twenty years of its existence, from 1846 to 1866, he was a director of the Belknap County Bank, acting on the discount committee, and in 1876 he was chosen a trustee of the Belknap Savings-Bank, an office which he continued to hold during the remainder of his life.

Mr. Pitman was a director of the Winnepesaukee Steamboat Company, also of the Concord Railroad, president of the Penigewasset Valley Railroad.

But his ability was, perhaps, put to the severest test in connection with the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad, of which at the time of his death he was senior director, having been elected to that office as early as 1858. It was mainly through his persistent energy, foresight and tact that the railroad enterprise was preserved from financial ruin and its late prosperity secured. What Mr. Pitman accomplished in connection with the distinguished president of the road, the late John E. Lyon, in restoring the credit of the corporation when failure seemed inevitable, can be appreciated only by those who knew the difficulties and discouragements with which he had to contend.

For a number of years Mr. Pitman was engaged in manufacturing, and his efforts in this direction were concentrated in 1868 in the production of knit-goods.

In conducting this business he held a controlling interest in the firm of Pitman, Tilton & Co., which was, in 1874, incorporated as the Pitman Manufacturing Company, and in this he was president and principal owner.

Mr. Pitman was a life-long Democrat and thoroughly interested in the success of the party, without ever seeking any official position for himself.

He was, however, a representative from Meredith to the General Court in 1851 and 1852, and showed that he was thoroughly well adapted to the work of legislation.

Mr. Pitman was for forty-three years a member of the Laconia Congregational Church, and identified with its activity in many relations. He was the principal member of the building committee, under whose direction the house was remodeled in 1871, making it at that time one of the finest church edifices in Northern New Hampshire.

He was a man whose kindness of heart was recognized by those with whom he came in contact from day to day, and he was held in grateful remembrance by the many who had become indebted to him for wise counsel or timely encouragement.

Prompt in aiding every worthy effort to secure individual prosperity or public advantage, he was especially interested in the success of young men who desired to engage in business for themselves, and lived to see many manufactories and other business enterprises thoroughly established through the financial assistance they had received from him. The following, taken from the resolutions adopted by his townsmen, who had been called together for that purpose immediately after his death, will show, to some extent, how he was regarded by those among whom the greater part of his life had been passed:

"We deeply lament the loss which we, in common with others, have sustained by the death of one so intimately connected with the substantial history and prosperity of our town. Mr. Pitman was widely and most favorably known as a strong business man, of unshakable integrity and great sagacity, always punctual in meeting every engagement, and faithful in performing every duty, and combining energy with prudence to a rare degree. No one has contributed more largely to give to Laconia its enviable rank as a business centre than Mr. Pitman, and his loss will be long and severely felt far beyond the immediate circle in which he moved."

Although so far advanced in years, Mr. Pitman continued to be actively engaged in business to the end of life.

His last illness was of short duration, and he died in peace at his own home on the 16th of February, 1883, aged seventy-four years. Thus for upwards of a half-century Mr. Pitman was a resident of Laconia, holding a high place in the esteem of his fellow-citizens, on account of the upright character of his life, and succeeding by patient industry and skillful management in acquiring a large estate.

Mr. Pitman was married, on May 9, 1841, to Charlotte Abby, daughter of Charles and Abigail Parker. Their children were Elizabeth W. (now Mrs. Charles U. Bell, of Lawrence, Mass.); Helen M., deceased (the first wife of Mr. Bell); Charles F. (the present manager of the Pitman Manufacturing Company); Joseph W., and Walter H., who continue the business of the father under the established partnership name of J. P. Pitman & Co.

HISTORY OF MEREDITH.

CHAPTER I.

Introductory—Topography and Description of Town—First Settlement—Extracts from Proprietors' Records of Salem and New Salem—Proprietors' Grant—Names of Persons Drawing Lots—First Saw-Mill—First Improvements and Residents—First Births—1701-1801, etc.

THE history of Meredith really covers a period of nearly two and a half centuries, for in 1652 a party of hardy adventurers was detailed by Massachusetts to seek the northern source of the Merrimack, and at the ancient Aqueductan, or Weirs, August 1, 1652, they chiseled the inscription on the rock which bears the name of Endicott, so-called in honor of the Governor of Massachusetts, who gave them their commission.

The foot of Lake Winnepesaukee was a favorite resort for the red man. Large villages stood on each side of the river, and on the Laconia side can yet be seen the site of one of their forts. Eighty years ago their dams filled the river, built for the purpose of taking the shad, which swarmed there in the fall. Here the warlike chief, Wohawa, called a council to inflame the neighboring tribes just previous to the bloody days of 1675, and here the gallant, but ill-fated, Lovewell often halted in his raids on the Ossipees. This whole region is rich in legendary lore, and many an interesting story could be related if time and space would permit; but we must turn to more authentic history.

Meredith is one of the oldest towns in this part of the State. Her early settlers were men and women of a most sturdy character. They were pioneers of a more than ordinary type, and took an active part in the formation of the Granite State, and stamped their individuality upon its enactments. The example which they displayed of heroic faith, of invincible courage, of bold and untiring enterprise, and their sacrifices in developing the resources of the country, all reflect honor upon them, and their descendants should recall their heroic struggles with pride, and by these recollections be stimulated to an emulation as noble, to a patriotism as pure, to virtues as exalted and philanthropy as generous.

This town was incorporated by the Governor and Council December 30, 1768, and was within the bounds of Mason's patent. By an act approved December 30, 1799, Stone Dam and Bear Islands were annexed. A division of the town took place July 14, 1855, the southeasterly portion being incorporated into a town by the name of Laconia. By an act approved July 3, 1873, a portion of Meredith was annexed to Centre Harbor.

Meredith is thirty-six miles north of Concord, and is bounded on the north by Centre Harbor and Lake Winnepesaukee; north and northeast by said lake; southeast by Laconia; south by Sanbornton, and west and northwest by New Hampton. Waukawan Lake (formerly called Measley Lake), near the village, is connected with Lake Winnepesaukee by a stream affording a large amount of water-power. As a farming town, it is surpassed by but few in the State. Agriculture is the principal employment of its inhabitants, who are well recompensed for the labor bestowed. The soil is deep, fertile, easily cultivated, and many of the farms beautifully situated on the shores of Lake Winnepesaukee, which washes a large portion of its southern and northeastern borders. At Meredith village there is one of the best water privileges in the State, which is controlled by the Meredith Mechanic Association, and there is considerable capital invested in manufactures. The population is about eighteen hundred. There are two post-offices,—Meredith village and Meredith Centre. The present town officers are,—Selectmen, William S. Smith, J. L. Prescott, O. N. Roberts; Clerk, I. C. Boynton; Treasurer, T. S. Moses; Superintendents, F. L. Mason, John Webster. S. W. Rollins, Esq., Probate judge of Belknap County, is a resident of the town.

The oldest physician is George Sanborn, M.D. The present churches are Congregational, Calvin Baptist and Free-Will Baptist. There is one bank, Meredith Village Savings-Bank, with a deposit of three hundred and thirty thousand dollars, and over nine hundred and ninety depositors. The manufacturers are Waukawan Hosiery Mills, Samuel Hodgson, proprietor (see biography); J. A. Lang, piano-forte cases; Meredith Shook and Lumber Company; American Twist Drill Company; Wadleigh Plow Company; J. S. Robinson & Co., organs; G. H. Clark & Co., lumber.

First Settlement—Extracts from "Proprietors' Records" of Salem and New Salem.—The first settlement of this territory was commenced in 1748, and the land was surveyed and laid out as the town of Salem, which soon was changed to New Salem, and this name the township bore until the incorporation of Meredith. The business was done and proprietors' meetings held for twenty years principally in Exeter. We give extracts from "Proprietors' Records," the following being the first record: "November the 3d, 1748, Ensign Jonathan Longfellow and fifty-nine others petition 'that they may have a township or a tract of land granted or given to them and to their heirs forever. Gentlemen, whose right it is to grant or give our request, we being the loyal and dutiful subjects of His Majesty, King George the Second, we pray you to grant or give to us a part of the land which is to be laid out into townships in our frontiers above.'" The same persons met November 19, 1748, and organized by voting "Ensin Oliver Smith, moderator, and Jethro Person, treasurer, to keep the money to be raised by the society for carrying on the business." "Voted, Ensin Oliver Smith, Joseph Jewett, Joseph Smith and Daniel Clark be a committee to go up and lay out a township." December 19, 1748, "Voted, Joseph Rawlins have two pounds three shillings, old tenor, for going to Hampton and Eping for a surveyor." November 14, 1749, "Voted, That there be a comety to joyn with the comety of the first town to run the line at the head of^s Towns between the Pound and Penigewasset river, and to look out a place for a saw-mill and for a Senter Sware." At a meeting of the proprietors, held at the dwelling-house of Tilton Lawrence, at Stratham, December 26, 1750, "Voted, Ensin Jonathan Longfellow moderator for^s meeting. Voted, Joseph Jewett, Josiah Sandborn and Jonathan Longfellow, or any two of them, to go down to Portsmouth and order draw the first division of lots." [This first division comprised about what is now contained in the town of Laconia, with a little of the present Meredith on its northern boundary]. "Voted, Five shillings on each wright. Voted, That all that don't pay to Mr. Josiah Sandborn their respective sones due on their wrights at or before the 4th day of January next, their wrights to be forfeited for their neglecting. Josiah Sandburn, Daniel Smith and Joseph Clark be a committee, a just accounts with the Treshurs and Collectors for the town of Salem." November 2, 1752, "A committee was chosen to lay out a second division of lots." [This division included the portion on the west and north of Winnisquam Lake.] At a meeting of the proprietors of the township of Salam (so called), at the house of Captain John Lights, in Exeter, January 1, 1753, "Voted, That the Proprietors' annual meeting for the future shall be on the first Monday in January, in order to chuse Town officers. Voted, That their should be three assessors and one collector chosen for the year ensuing. Voted, That Mr. Josiah Samborn be Treasurer for this year. Voted, That Mr. Jonathan Longfellow shall have one shilling, old tenor, Praecer for every acer he shall, on his own charge, Gitt added to the township of Salam, more than is contained in the two Plans all Ready taken, and to Gitt it confirm^d by the Grantors; and if he dose not git any added, is to have nothing for his charges; and that the assessors shall tax the Proprietors for to pay him for what he Gitts added." May 3, 1754, the proprietors of Portsmouth increased the grant by calling the north line twelve miles instead of seven, so adding Meredith Neck.

PROPRIETORS' GRANT.

"At a meeting of the Proprietors of the lands purchased of John Tuffon Mason, Esq., in the Province of New Hampshire, held by adjournment at the dwelling-house of Sarah Prust, widow, in Portsmouth, on Saturday, the thirty-first day of December, Anno Domini 1748, Voted, that their be and hereby is granted unto Samuel Palmer, Esq., Jonathan Shaw, Benj Shaw, Junr., all of Hampton in^s Province; Samuel Goodlow, Junr., John Purnart, John Smith, Benj Jewett, Joseph Rawlings, Elisha Smith, Daniel Clark, Tilton Larrance, Joseph Clarke, Jonathan Shibley, Richard Scammon, James Scammon, Benj^s Whiteher, William Chase, Moses Chase, Benj^s Norris, Lazarus Row, Joseph Fifield, Moses Rawlings, John Taylor, Jacob Low, David Rawlings, Chase Robinson, Josiah Goodlow, all of Stratham in said Province; Jonathan Longfellow, John Light, Joseph Wadleigh, Jonathan Wadleigh, Daniel Smith, Daniel Gale, Josiah Robinson, Junr., Joseph Robinson, Joseph Pearson, Elishalet Rawlings, Joseph Rawlings, Junr., Nathaniel Bartlet, Junr., Ephraim Robinson, Abraham Clark, Joseph Rawlings, Daniel Thurstin, Josiah Samborn, John Morgan, Joseph Goodlow, Oliver Smith, Junr., Jacob Longfellow, John Leavit, Junr., Oliver Smith, Joseph Norris, Samuel Norris, Benj^s Norris, Samuel Norris, Junr., Josiah Samborn, Robert Cutler, all of Exeter in said Province, and Thomas Ford, of Nottingham in said Province (together with twenty other persons hereafter to be named by said Proprietors), in equal shares, excepting as hereafter hereinafter expressed, on the terms, conditions and limitations hereinafter expressed: all that tract of land within the Province of New Hampshire, Containing the extent and quantity of six miles Square, etc."

At a proprietors' meeting, held January 2, 1761, this action was taken,—

"Whereas, those persons that first settle in new Towns are exposed to many difficulties, as well as great charges in clearing of ways to their own particular lots, &c. It is therefore Voted the Proprietors of the above sd Township be fixed with four thousand Pounds, old tenor, to be paid in one year to the first twenty Proprietors that appear and give obligation to settle their Rights in the above sd Township in the following manner (or some person under them),—Viz To fall six acres of trees in one year from this date & to clear up three acres of said land fit for planting or mowing in sixteen months from this date, & in twenty months to have a house built fit to dwell in, eighteen feet long & fourteen wide, or equal thereto, & to abide there four years after that time, and if in case that twenty proprietors do not appear in six months from this date to settle their Rights on the above conditions the number of Proprietors that do appear shall be entitled to the four thousand pounds, to be equally divided between them. Voted that there be a Bridge built over Wampisooke River, at the saw mill grant, within twenty month from this date."

The First Saw-Mill was commenced in 1765, on the afore-mentioned grant (which covered the present business portion of Laconia on the Meredith side); but after it was carried away by the freshet of 1779 it was rebuilt on the Gilmanton side, in 1780.

January 6, 1766, "Voted that M. Eben^s Smith & William Mead shall have the care & charge of the saw-mill in New Salem for the space of three years to come, and that they shall saw logs to the halves for any of the Proprietors or settlers in said Township that shall bring logs on the stage of said mill."

War of the Revolution—Action of Town Concerning Deputy—Powder, Lead and Flints—Firearms—Committee of Safety—Soldiers' Pay, etc.—Names of Legal Voters—Names of Soldiers—Soldiers' Orders and other Documents—War of 1812.

Revolution.—This infant town took a strong and patriotic stand in the Revolutionary contest. At a special town-meeting held May 15, 1775, the following action was taken :

" Ebenezer Smith was chosen as Deputy to meet with the Deputies from the other towns in said Province, which convention is proposed to be holden at the town of Exeter, in said Province, the seventeenth day of this instant, May, at ten o'clock A. M., with full power to adopt and pursue such measures as may be judged most expedient to preserve and restore the Rights of this and the other Colonies, and that he is hereby empowered to act in behalf of himself and his constituents for six months if it should be thought by said convention necessary, and to adjust as occasion may require. Voted that the Selectmen of said town purchase one barrel of powder of about fifty or sixty wt., and lead or bullets & flints answerable thereto and that they apply for the part of the Province stock of powder belonging to this town and that they also procure ten good guns at the cost & charge of said town and to be presented as soon as may be. Voted to enlist ten soldiers of this town to hold themselves in readiness to march to the relief of any of our distressed country brethren, and that they be furnished by the committee of said town at the cost thereof, and that each soldier have two shillings per day for each day they shall expend."

August 29, 1776, " Chose a Committee of safety to consist of five persons. Voted John Folsham, Jonathan Smith, Nathaniel Robinson, William Mead and Lieutenant Joseph Robards be said Committee. Voted to raise the sum of forty-five pounds, lawful money, to be applied to purchase fire-arms, such a number as that sum will purchase, for the use and service of said town, and that the selectmen of said town be a committee to apply that sum of money to procure said fire-arms at the cost and charge of said town, as aforesaid, as soon as may be."

An article in the warrant calling a town-meeting on March 31, 1777, at the house of Ebenezer Smith, where the meetings were usually held, was for the town "to assist Captain Joshua Crockett in the raising eight men from the company under his command to serve in the Continental Army the term of three years, or during the war with Britain, as they chuse, including those that have already enlisted and passed muster in either of the regiments of Stark, Poor or Scammell, and see what sum the town will vote to raise for those that shall appear to enlist into said service as aforesaid, and vote thereon as the town shall see fit when met."

At an adjourned meeting of the town, April 7, 1777, this action was taken,—"Voted to choose a committee of three persons to procure the five men that are the remainder part of the proportion of men for the three Continental Regiments to be raised from this town at the cost and charge of said town, and that the committee allow & pay each man the sum of ten pounds, lawful money, as a town bounty, and allow in that proportion and give credit to all and each person that have been from this town, according to their respective times they have served accordingly in the present war." April 6, 1778, "Voted to raise eighty pounds to pay the other Continental Soldier to be raised for and in behalf of this town, and if said soldier should not be procured, then the money to be for the use of said town."

On March 29, 1777, when the call was issued for all legal voters to assemble, the following names were entered in the town records:

Among the Revolutionary soldiers accredited to Meredith we give these names,— Nathaniel Holland, John Robinson, Jonathan Crosby, Jonathan Smith, Jr., Moses Senter, Oliver Smith, Thomas Frohock, Aaron Rawlings, Joseph Eaton, James Simlar and William Malson. Jonathan Smith was in Rhode Island service.

April 5, 1784, the town voted "that the selectmen settle with those soldiers who have served during the war as this town's quota of the Continental [Army], as they shall think just, and make provision for the payment thereof, as they shall judge best, and also settle with Thomas Frohock for the loss of a gun & blanket lost in the army."

The War of 1812.—The town does not seem to have taken a very active part in the War of 1812, and but little concerning it is to be found in the records. August 1, 1812, a warrant was issued for a town-meeting, to see what compensation the town will make to the militia who are attached to the regular service from this town, "by virtue of a Law of the Congress of the United States," in addition to the pay to be allowed by the general government, agreeable to a petition of sundry inhabitants of said town. At the legal meeting following, on September 19th, the vote was passed not to raise any money for that purpose.

MEREDITH—(Continued).

Civil History after the Revolution—Extracts from Town Records concerning Place of Town-Meeting—Change of Date of Town-Meeting—Preaching of the Gospel—Parsonage Right—Weirs Bridge—Equipments of War—Punishment of Rogues, Vagrants, etc.—"Pole Parish" at Meredith Bridge—Town Farm—Proprietors of Winnepesaukee Steamboat granted Permission to raise Bridge—Fire-Engine Company—Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad—Village Precinct at Meredith Bridge—Town-House—The Great Catastrophe—Village Precinct, Meredith Village—Committee of Investigation, etc.—Present Town-House.

Civil History.—In 1778, Ebenezer Smith was chosen to represent the town in a convention to meet at Concord, June 10th, "for the laying of a plan of government for this State." This year Meredith was represented in the General Court with Sanbornton.

The town held its meetings at the houses of the citizens until August 30, 1790, when the place of holding was changed to the North Church. The date of annual meeting was changed, by an act passed November 5, 1784, to the second Monday in March. March 9, 1795, the town voted Chase Wiggin constable, and that he pay nineteen shillings for that office. September 14, 1801, at a special meeting, the town "Voted to raise sixty dollars for to be applied to hyre the Preaching of the Gospel in said town the current year. Voted, to sell the Parsonage Right in said town. Voted, to Lease said Lots for the Terms of eighty years, or as long as wood Grows or water Runs, the interest to be paid yearly, to be applied for the use of hiring the Preaching of the Gospel in town annually." March 12, 1804, "Voted, that the town should build the one-half a Bridge over the river at the Great wears (so called), at the outlet of Winnepesaukee pond."

One article in the warrant calling the meeting of March 13, 1810 was

"To see what method the Town will accept to procure Powder, Ball, Flint, Tin or Camp-Kittles, and a place for the safe keeping of the same, agreeably to Law of this State; also, to see if the Inhabitants of said town will vote to build, purchase or hire a Building or house to be used for the keeping, correcting and setting to work of Rogues, Vagrants, Common beggars, Lewd, Idle and disorderly Persons, and to appoint proper officers for the Government of said house, and to make, establish and adopt all necessary rules, orders and Regulations for the Ruling, Governing and punishing of such Persons as may there be committed; also To see if the town will give their consent that a Pole Parish shall be incorporated at Meredith Bridge, to consist of Poles belonging to Meredith and Gilmantown, by the name of the Meredith Bridge Religious Society, agreeable to a Petition of Sundry inhabitants and freeholders of said town. Also, Voted, to choose committee of three to confer with the Selectmen of committee of Gilmantown and Sanbornton, concerning erecting a building to put Vagabonds and Disorderly persons in and employ them."

In September, 1827, the town "Voted, not to divide the town into school districts, agreeably to the late law of the State of New Hampshire." In November of the same year this vote was passed, that "all the school districts in said town be defined as they are now defined."

At the annual town-meeting held March 9, 1830, it was "Voted, that the selectmen be authorized and directed to purchase a farm for the use of said Town, and take a Deed of the same, and also that the Selectmen be authorized and directed to give the Towns security for the purchase sum, payable at such time and in such manner as the Selectmen may deem proper, and that such farm shall not exceed the value of fifteen hundred dollars, and, when such purchase has been made, the said Selectmen are authorized and directed to proceed and make arrangements to move the poor of the Town of Meredith onto said farm as speedily as circumstances will authorize, and that the Selectmen be authorized to appropriate for this purpose any sum of money, raised or not otherwise appropriated, belonging to said Town."

March 11, 1829, "Voted, that the police law of Portsmouth be adopted at Meredith Bridge and three-fourths of a mile from said bridge every way on the Meredith side and no farther;" also, "that idle persons be made to work." October 2, 1832, "Voted, not to give any liberty to the proprietors of Winnepesaukee Steamboat to raise Wares (Weirs) Bridge." In November, 1832, however, they amended their vote in this way, "That the proprietors of Winnepesaukee Steamboat, now building, or any of them have the right, so far as this town is interested, to raise and make such alterations in the Bridge at the Wares, at the outlet of the lake, as will be found Necessary in order for the safe passage of the Said Boat over the falls at said outlet at all times." March 12, 1839, "Voted, 446 votes out of a total of 467 for a division of Stratford County into three parts."

Fire-Engine Company.—May 11, 1840, "Lake Fernald, Joseph Dodge, David Corlis, Jr., Nathaniel G. Corliss and John Busiel have given notice that we and our associates have formed ourselves into a company, to be known by the name of the First Fire-Engine Company in Meredith village, agreeably to an act of the Legislature of New Hampshire, passed July 1, 1831, A. B. Merrick, clerk." March 11, 1845, "Voted, that the selectmen be authorized to invest the sum of $10,000 in the capital stock of the Boston, Concord & Montreal Railroad, providing that the railroad comes through Meredith and stop building the road called the Long routes." March 11, 1846, "Voted, that the surplus fund agents be authorized to collect and pay over the two first assessments that is now due on the railroad stock, which the town by vote directed the selectmen to subscribe for at the last annual meeting, and if the road should go north of Lake village they shall pay over the assessments as they are called for." March 14, 1848, "Voted, that the town agent be directed to collect twenty-six hundred dollars of the town funds in his hands, and pay the same to the treasurer of the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad, in part of assessment on stock taken in said road by the town." March 14, 1849, "Voted, that the selectmen be authorized to borrow a sum of money, not to exceed seventeen hundred and fifty dollars, to meet the deficiency in the town's subscription for railroad stock." August 20, 1849, "Pursuant to an application and request of Stephen Gale, W. Melchor, John T. Coffin, Jeremiah Elkins and sixty-five other citizens of Meredith Bridge, dated July 25, 1849, made to the selectmen of the town, the latter established a village precinct there." March 9, 1852, "Voted, by 221 to 125, against amendment of State Constitution abolishing the religious test; by 174 to 165, in favor of the amendment abolishing the property qualification of voters." March 15, 1854, "Voted, that the town of Meredith build a town-house at Meredith village, providing the inhabitants of Third Division build one-half of the house by contribution, and pay their share to be raised by taxes." Voted, that the town build a town-house, in conjunction with the citizens of Meredith village, at Meredith village. Voted, that the town raise seven hundred and fifty dollars for the purpose of building a town-house at Meredith village, and that as much of that sum as may be necessary to do the same be applied thereto. Voted, that the town of Meredith build and finish a suitable town-house, and that the same be finished in season for the annual meeting to be holden on the second Tuesday of March, 1855. Voted, that John Haynes, William Pike and David B. Plumer shall be the building committee to see to the building of the town-house at Meredith village. Voted, that the selectmen be authorized to call the next annual town-meeting in 1855 at Meredith village, if the town-house is finished and is ready."

The Great Catastrophe.—The annual town-meeting met, pursuant to warning, at 9 A.M., March 13, 1855, in the yet unfinished town hall at Meredith village. Soon after organization, while preparing to take a vote by ballot, the rush of the voters, of whom there were from six to eight hundred present, threw too much weight upon the timbers sustaining the floor. They gave way and about one hundred and fifty were precipitated into the basement. Out of this vast mass of humanity sixty persons were carried from the ruins seriously injured, "with broken bones, dislocated joints and internal injuries." Four, James W. Durgin, Washington Smith, Benjamin D. Robinson and Nathaniel Nichols, died in a short time; a number of others were so injured as to cause their death after a longer period, and others were crippled for life. Medical aid was procured from all the adjoining towns and from Concord, and it was long before the community recovered from the terrible effect of the catastrophe.

In 1855, among the votes cast for representatives to General Court, Elizabeth Bachelder received three. In July of the same year, by act of the Legislature, the town of Meredith was divided and the town of Laconia organized, and, in 1859, a village precinct was laid out and established at Meredith village.

—The undersigned, Selectmen of Meredith, having, agreeably to a Petition of Amos Cram and others, inhabitants of Meredith Village, so called, established the following lines as the boundary of a Village Precinct, do commence as follows: Beginning on Lake Winnipissogee, opposite of the southeast corner of land owned by Joseph W. Lang and occupied by Thomas E. Lang, Jr., on the neck road, so called, thence northerly, across the said road on the line between the said Joseph W. Lang's land and land of Joseph Elaud on line between land of said Elaud and George G. Hoyt, thence on line between Malison Chase and Joseph Ela to land of Dr. John Sanborn; thence northerly, between said Chase and said Dr. Sanborn's land, to the main road leading by Richard Neal's house; thence across said road between said Sanborn's and said Ela's land, thence on the northerly and easterly side of said Ela's land to land of Timothy Belger, on mill brook, near said Belger's bark-mill; thence westerly, on said mill brook and mill pond, to land of J. Ela; thence on said Ela's land to land of said Belger; thence between said Belger's land and land of Thomas E. Lang to land of Samuel Bean and John How; thence westerly, between the said Bean's and How's land and land of Thomas E. Lang, to Mousley Pond; thence southerly on said Mousley Pond to the main road leading from Meredith Village to William Pike's dwelling-house; thence easterly, across said road, to land of David Corlies; thence southerly, on said Corlies' land, to land of Bradbury Robinson; thence on the westerly, southerly and easterly side of said Robinson's land, across the main road leading from Meredith Village, by the house of A. P. Ladd, to Lake Winnipissogee; thence on the westerly and northerly shore of said Lake to the bounds begun at.

"Meredith, March 30th, 1856."

In 1871 the financial affairs of the town were found to be in a very unsatisfactory condition, and at a special town-meeting, held May 26th, a committee of investigation, consisting of S. W. Rollins, S. D. Pease and G. G. Hoyt, was appointed, and the selectmen were authorized to offer a reward of five hundred dollars "for the recovery of the town records and papers which had been lost." This committee had an arduous task which lasted several years, but it saved quite an amount of money for the town. At the same meeting the town voted one thousand dollars to pay "expense of defending the annexation of part of the town to Centre Harbor." January 21, 1873, the town voted to exempt from taxation for a term not exceeding ten years any manufacturing establishment which should be erected or put into operation with a capital of five thousand dollars or upwards. May 23, 1876, "Voted to build a Town-House on the lot of Josiah T. Sturtevant," and appropriated five hundred dollars in addition to what had been raised for that purpose; appointed George H. Clark, John S. Sanborn, Benjamin F. Wiggin a committee to convey the old lot to Mr. Sturtevant, if they accept his proposition, and to receive a conveyance of the lot from him in accordance therewith, and to give a lease of the first story of the building. November 7, 1876, "Voted three hundred dollars, to provide seats, lights and warming apparatus for the new town hall." December 23, 1876, accepted and adopted the report of committee on town-house and ratified the deed taken and lease given by the committee.

MEREDITH—(Continued).

War of the Rebellion—Action of the Town and Extracts from Town Records—Aid for Families of Volunteers—Bonuses, etc.—Selectmen During the War—Recruiting Agents—Names of Soldiers—Roster of Company I, Twelfth Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers.

The Civil War (1861-65).—Meredith furnished for this war, out of a voting population of but a few over five hundred, one hundred and twenty-two officers and soldiers of her townsmen, and one hundred and five volunteer substitutes,—making a total of two hundred and twenty-seven. The record is a noble one, and indicates that the spirit of patriotism which animated the first settlers still dwells in the breasts of its people, and that they are worthy sons of noble sires. We quote from the town records the action taken by the town.

September 12, 1861, the town "Voted to raise three hundred dollars, to be expended in aiding the wives and children (under sixteen years) of volunteers or enrolled militia of this State, who may be mustered or enlisted into the United States service, and also, for the aid of parents or children dependent on them for support." Levi Towle, Isaiah Winch and Simeon D. Pease were appointed a committee to appropriate the money.

January 7, 1862, "Voted to raise six hundred dollars on the credit of the town to aid the wives and children of enlisted soldiers, to be laid out under the direction of the selectmen."

March 11, 1862, "Voted to raise four hundred dollars for the benefit of the wives and children of enlisted soldiers."

July 1, 1862, "Voted to raise and pay to all persons that may enlist in the service of the United States, one hundred dollars; this includes the number to fill our quota of the first call. Voted to raise fifty dollars and pay to each person that enlists into the service of the United States to fill our quota on the last call." This vote was reconsidered, and in its place it was "Voted to appropriate and raise the sum of one hundred dollars for each and every soldier, citizens and residents of this town, who shall enter into the service of the United States on or before August 18, 1862; the same to be paid after the soldier is mustered into service, and not to exceed one hundred and one man; and the selectmen are instructed to hire said sum of money upon the credit of the town."

October 4, 1862, "Voted to pay one hundred dollars to those that may enlist in the service of the United States as nine months' men to fill our quota, also to all those that have enlisted in said service since September 18, 1862;" also, "Voted to raise a sum not exceeding four thousand dollars to aid dependent families of volunteers that have enlisted into the service of the United States."

March 10, 1863, "Voted to raise, for the purpose of aiding dependent families of volunteers now in United States service, a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, and that the selectmen be authorized to hire and appropriate the same as it is needed."

August 1, 1863, "Voted to raise three hundred dollars for every man that is drafted into the United States service, or his substitute, to be paid after he is mustered into service."

December 1, 1863, "Voted to raise for the purpose of aiding the families of volunteers who have enlisted into the United States service from Meredith, or who may enlist under the call of the President for three hundred thousand men, and those that have been or may be conscripted into said service, or their substitutes, a sum not to exceed two thousand dollars, and that the selectmen be authorized to borrow the money on the credit of the town."

December 1, 1863, "Voted to raise a sum not to exceed fifteen thousand dollars, to be applied as bonuses, with which to raise the quota of the town, under the last call of the President for three hundred thousand men, and that the selectman be instructed to fill the quota by themselves and agents."

March 8, 1864, a motion was made to pay enlisted men from this town one hundred dollars bounty. "Voted to amend this by adding one hundred dollars;" also, "Voted to raise ten thousand dollars, to be expended in obtaining volunteers for the army, at such times and as the agents deemed best."

June 6, 1864, "Voted to raise the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be paid as bounties for volunteers, drafted men or their substitutes, who may be mustered into the service of the United States for the town, under any anticipated or future calls for volunteers or drafted men for such service."

August 11, 1864, "Voted to raise twenty thousand dollars, and appropriate the same as bounties to soldiers who shall be mustered into the United States service, to fill the last call of the Government, whether said soldiers shall voluntarily enlist or go as substitutes for drafted or enrolled men, and for bounties for men drafted under said call for one year, who shall be mustered into United States service as part of the quota of the town, and for incidental expenses in obtaining and recruiting the volunteers aforesaid."

March 1, 1865, "Voted to raise fifteen hundred dollars to aid families of volunteers, drafted men or their substitutes; also to raise fourteen thousand dollars to refund the money paid out by drafted men and others who obtained substitutes who have filled the town's quota; also the amount raised by subscription to aid the same."

SELECTMEN DURING THE WAR.—As it required as high an order of statesmanship to creditably fill the office of selectman during this critical period as to be a Congressman in time of peace, we give the names of those entrusted with the office,—1861, John W. Bedee, Sheppard Rowe, Levi Towle; 1862, Levi Towle, Isaiah Winch, Simeon D. Pease; 1863-65, Colonel Ebenezer Stevens, Nathan L. True, John Smith (2d); 1866, John Smith (2d), Levi Towle, Charles L. Hoyt.

TOWN AGENTS.—Daniel S. Bedee and James H. Plai-sted were recruiting agents to procure volunteers, and served through nearly every year of the war. Occasionally another was associated with them.

- Under the call of the President, July 3, 1863, there were twenty-three men drafted September 29, 1863, all of whom furnished substitutes. Under the President's call made October 17, 1863, the town furnished twenty-six volunteers, only one (William Prescott) from the town. In answer to the call for more troops made March 14, 1863, Meredith furnished sixteen volunteers, as follows:
- John R. McCrellis, Fifth New Hampshire; re-enlisted; promoted to captain.
 William H. Lovering, First New Hampshire Cavalry; re-enlisted.
 Luther Dockham, Eighth New Hampshire; re-enlisted.
 Martin B. Plummer, First New Hampshire Cavalry.

The other twelve were not residents of Meredith. Three were drafted and furnished substitutes.

July 18, 1864, when the President called for five hundred thousand men, this town furnished forty-five men, of whom five were volunteers from Meredith, namely,—

George T. Crane, captain, First New Hampshire Cavalry
George E. Gilman, lieutenant, First New Hampshire Cavalry
John Baiger, private, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery
Oscar J. Piper, private, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery
Frank B. Swain, private, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery

Twenty enrolled men furnished substitutes; the remainder were volunteers, not residents (twenty in number).

Under the last call of the President, made December 19, 1864, nine enrolled men furnished substitutes, that number being more than sufficient to fill the quota, or accounts of credits for three years' men.

After said committee had consulted together on the premises made the following Report, Viz^t That in their opinion the town should build a house forty feet in length and thirty-two feet in width, two stories high, for said Mr. Williams, on the first Division lot, in said town, called the minister's lot, and build a steeple and steeple-sand house and belfry, and complete a good floor under the one half of said house and build a good stack of chimneys in said house, and finish three rooms in said house in a good workmanlike manner, to be done and completed by the first of November next, as a settlement, and to give the said Mr. Williams sixty pounds, as salary, yearly, so long as he shall continue to be the town's minister, the one third part of said sum to be paid in cash, the one third part to be paid in good beef and pork, the above beef and pork to be at the common cash price, which report the town Voted to receive. The town chose a committee of three persons, Viz^t Capt. William Davis, Capt. William Ray and Lt. Joseph Roberts, to present the same to Mr. Williams for his approbation or disapprobation. The town also Voted that if Mr. Williams should settle in town that he shall preach in the second and third Divisions, their full proportion according to the money they pay towards the support of said Mr. Williams, if requested.

"Attest,—

"JOSHUA WOODMAN, Moderator,
"JOHN GILMAN, Clerk, P. T."

"MEREDITH, January the 25th, 1792.

"Gentlemen

"As God the Supreme has seen meet to bring me among you to preach the glad tidings which the Gospel abounds, and has disposed the hearts of the people of this town to manifest so strong an affection toward me, as to make heart of me in a public and unfeigned manner to settle among you as a town minister, as appears from the Votes Committed to me as a committee, chosen by the town at a legal meeting for that purpose, I have, in the most serious and pious manner, attended to your invitation, wishing not to keep you in any suspense respecting the matter, have thought it to be my duty to give you my answer, in the affirmative, praying that the God of peace may send in each of our hearts that the connection may be for the advancement of His glory and our mutual happiness; that I may be enabled, by divine assistance, to serve you in the sacred office, and being faithful to my Lord in performance of the solemn vows already taken upon me, and that you all may ever hear the word with joy and be nourished thereby, that I may, to the end of my short life, have abundant reason to adore the God who sent me to feed his flock in this place, by our adhering to the rules of the Gospel shall at some future day be my crown and joy in the Lord.

"I am, Gentlemen, with all possible esteem,

SIMON FINLEY WILLIAMS,

"To CAPT. DAVIS, } Cl. of the "CAPT. RAY, } of the
"LT. JOSEPH ROBERTS, } of the

The pastorate of Mr. Williams did not result in as much good as might have been expected from those sanguine expressions, as his private life was not in conformity with his belief and caused much discontent and scandal. Cognizant of this, in 1797 he asked for his dismissal; but the town voted not to dismiss him, but appointed a committee "to confer and arbitrate with him." "He had to give up all the back-pay due him of one hundred and fifty pounds, 40 pounds in back salary and six acres of land, and 80 pounds lawful money, in other pay, and an addition of 9 acres of land." And finally, six months after his request, the town "Voted to dismiss Rev. S. F. Williams from this ministry, by giving up fifteen acres of land and all the back salary."

Congregational Church—FIRST CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.—The Congregational Church in Cent-

Harbor and Third Division of Meredith was organized February 20, 1815, by the assistance of Rev. Edward Warren, missionary. Moses Morse was elected deacon of said church. On March 11, 1817, the town took action on the article in the warrant calling the meeting, "to see if the town has any objection to a society being incorporated in the Third Division of said town, to be known by the name of the First Congregational Society in Meredith," and "Voted that Ebenezer Pitman, Jr., the representative, be instructed to care for the bill of incorporation before the Legislature, that the town funds may not be embraced in the act of incorporation."

March 24, 1817, Rev. Daniel Smith was installed over said church. The meetings were held half the time on Centre Harbor Hill, and the other half in the Third Division of Meredith, in a church built a mile and one fourth north of Meredith village, which was raised in 1808, and owned by Congregationalists and Calvinistic Baptists. Rev. Daniel Smith died in Meredith August 18, 1824. The next mention we have of a settled pastor is January 1, 1829, when Rev. Reuben Porter was installed, and, April 27, 1830, was dismissed. He was followed by the Rev. Joseph Lane, who entered upon his pastorate April 20, 1831, and was dismissed in April, 1833.

April 19, 1831, this church "Voted to assume the name of the First Congregationalist Church in the Third Division of Meredith." A new church edifice was built one-fourth of a mile north of Meredith village by this church and society, and was dedicated February 7, 1833.

After the dismissal of Rev. Joseph Lane, for nearly three years, Rev. Abram Wheeler acted as pastor. March 28, 1838, Rev. Eli W. Taylor was installed, and his dismissal took place September 12, 1841.

Rev. Giles Leach was installed over this church November 23, 1842. A brief sketch of this earnest and fervent preacher of the gospel, and of one who left a pleasant memory of his life and ministry in Meredith, is in place here. Mr. Leach was born in Bridgewater, Mass., April 1, 1801. He graduated at Amherst College in 1826 and at Andover (Mass.) Theological Seminary in 1833. His first parish was Sandwich, N. H.; from there he was called to this town, where he remained nearly twelve years, severing his connection with this church May 23, 1851. His next pastorate was in Wells, Me.; then he went to Rye, N. H. Here his wife died, and at the urgent solicitation of his four daughters, he resigned his charge, and made his home with them, passing the different seasons of the year at their homes. At present writing he is rapidly approaching the dark river of death, having had paralysis. He is a man of whom it can truly be said, "In him there is no guile."

Rev. Charles Burnham became pastor of the church January 8, 1857; his pastorate was one of the longest ever known in its history. His dismissal took place April 19, 1871. He was a scholarly man and an eloquent preacher. In November, 1872, Rev. George J. Bard succeeded Mr. Burnham, and was dismissed November 28, 1882. Rev. John E. Willey was ordained and installed as pastor February 28, 1883, and is the present clergyman.

About 1842 the church building was removed to its present location. In 1871 it was enlarged and thoroughly repaired at an expense of over four thousand dollars. In 1878 the society built a chapel near their church. February 20, 1885, this church celebrated its seventieth anniversary.

The following were the thirteen original members of the church: Ephraim Doton, David Robinson, Moses Morse, Jeremiah Towle, Joshua Norris, Stephen Norris, Hannah Morse, Elizabeth Robinson, Mary Ladd, Abigail Norris, Dorethy Sturtevant, Sarah Norris, Susannah Doton. During its existence there have been enrolled three hundred and ten members, and its present membership is eighty-three. The church and society are free from debt. The Sabbath-school numbers eighty scholars and eleven teachers.

We copy, as worthy of notice in these days of "woman's rights," one of the rules published by this church in 1829:

"Resolved, that it is the duty of Parents and Guardians to require the children and members of their respective families punctually to attend the public worship of God on the Sabbath and at other seasons, as opportunity may present, and utterly to forbid their attending the meetings of Female preachers or speakers."

The present deacons are Moses Morse, John Osgood, John Sanborn, Richard Furber, Daniel Norris, Levi Leach, Horatio N. Newell, George N. Wiley, Charles Maloon. Clerk, James Seavey.

Second Advent.—In 1843, Rev. William Miller and Rev. Joshua V. Himes held the first Millerite, or Second Advent meetings in the town, and from that time there has been occasional preaching by various persons. The number of believers in this faith was once quite large, and a meeting-house was erected on the "Neck," but no organized society was formed and no stated services held regularly. At present meetings are held at the town hall.

The Original Baptist Church of Meredith.—The village church of the denomination, being part heir and successor, was founded in 1779, a little more than a decade after the incorporation of the town. In the hundred years and more which have passed the successive societies have had their seasons of great usefulness and prosperity, and have also had their dark days of trial and adversity. Through their chosen elders and teachers they have ministered to the spiritual needs of four generations of the Meredith people. This church was founded during the War of the Revolution, when men and the country were unsettled, when opportunities of education were very limited and the code of morals different from the present time, when the demoralizing influences of war—upon one generation can hardly live down—were upon the people and when everything was more or less in a state of chaos. The men who founded this first Baptist Church were "men of strong convictions concerning the truth, and considered doctrinal views essential to church membership, withdrawing the hand of fellowship on more than one occasion from those who dissented in some way from the articles of faith. They took the Bible as their counselor in all spiritual matters, and they refused to walk in fellowship with those who perverted and ignored the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. They were also zealous in propagating the peculiar tenets of their faith. Yet it was not only purity of doctrine, but purity of life and conduct, for which they earnestly strove. The records of their times show that it was not only considered a matter of discipline for any church member to indulge in intemperance or any other vice, but, as now, it was in some degree an occasion of social ostracism." In this brief tribute we clearly perceive that they followed the dictates of their consciences with firmness. Of the original settlers in Meredith (originally New Salem), the larger half came from towns in Rockingham County. They settled near the Parade (see Meredith's Parade, in this history), and from time to time, probably commencing as early as 1779, they received the spiritual ministrations of Dr. Samuel Shepard, of Brentwood, a skillful and learned physician, an eloquent preacher and a Baptist missionary. Through his efforts, the cause of the Master was so strengthened that on the 4th of November, 1779, the people met at Mr. William Mead's and, without ceremony, formed themselves into a church. They adopted the name of Anti-Pedo Baptist Church of Meredith at a meeting held Aug. 3, 1780, and adopted Calvinistic articles of faith. On the 21st of August in the same year nineteen male and eight female members were added to the church, and at the meeting held to vote on their reception John Gilman was chosen clerk of the society. Nicholas Folsom and Abram Swain were chosen ruling elders, and Jonathan Edgerly and Brother Crocket deacons. The right hand of fellowship was given to the deacons by Elder Folsom, and the ordination prayer was made by John Mead. John Kimball and Gideon Robins assisted in the laying on of hands. After this their numbers so increased that, in 1782, it was voted, after a season of prayer and fasting, to set apart Nicholas Folsom to the work of the Christian ministry. Accordingly, on the second Wednesday in September of the same year, a council of the ministers and delegates from the churches in Brentwood, Madborough, Gilmanton and Sandwich, met and ordained Mr. Folsom, the sermon being preached by Elder Hooper, of Brentwood. In the same year an effort was made to make Elder Folsom the town minister, but the town voted not to receive him. He was generally respected, but the voters objected to his doctrinal views. Elder Folsom, however, continued to preach until near the close of the eighteenth century, one-half the time in Meredith and one-half in Sanbornton, during which time the Meredith Church lost forty-five members, who removed their membership to Sanbornton, it being nearer their homes. These meetings of the church were held at school-houses and private residences, in the three divisions of the town, and were called branch or neighborhood meetings. In the absence of Elder Folsom, some of the associate elders or deacons officiated.

Elder Folsom received no compensation for his services except by the voluntary contribution of the people. He rode about the country on horseback, and whatever he received by way of donation found a place in his capacious saddle-bags. He owned a good farm in Meredith, which he cultivated.

He is mentioned as being a plain, direct and forcible preacher, preaching what he believed the truth, without fear or favor. Many of the older people recollect hearing their parents relate his witty sayings, and homely but telling illustrations.

There are several versions concerning the fate of the old meeting-house, which was probably built during the last decade of the century. The following is from one of the old citizens:

"The original meeting-house was about the size of a district school house and stood on the left-hand side of the highway. Early in this century it was set on fire by a Mrs. Morgan, an erratic woman, and wholly destroyed. She lived in the neighborhood and was offended because the people came to her house at the intermission of services to warm themselves, for in those days places of worship were not warmed, and she hated she would have been left from the annoyance. Her husband paid for the building destroyed."

The society then worshiped in the town-house, which stood on the Meredith Village border of the Parade, occupying it one Sunday and the Congregationalists the next, and also alternating in the occupancy of a meeting-house in the Third Division of the town. The town-house had the old-fashioned high-back pews, a high pulpit, above which was a sounding-board, and a gallery on the highway end, under which was the entrance. This arrangement could not have lasted many years, as a second place of worship was built near the General Wadleigh place, where the Union School-house now stands. The cottage near the Wadleigh house was the parsonage.

From 1800 to 1820 little of note occurred. The church was compelled to discipline some of its members, and to wage a continual war against the besetting sin of the times, intemperance, but the branch and neighborhood meetings were continued, and the membership increased. Elder Folsom, whose life had been one of self-sacrifice to duty, began now to show signs of age. He had gone cold, weary and hungry for the Master's cause, and knew little of the comforts of this generation. Even his fireside, which, however poor and humble, might have been pleasant, was made uncomfortable. It is said he tried to keep the church records upon birch-bark. He wrote by the light of a tallow dip, and upon complaining at one time to his wife of the poor light, she seized the records and threw them into the fire, saying she would make it light enough for him. The records were rewritten from memory.

Rev. Nicholas Folsom was born in Brentwood, N. H., in 1747. His father was an Englishman, named John Smith, who took the name Folsom from his native town after he came to America, and became a settler in Meredith in 1778, accompanied by his son Nicholas, who, in his youth, was a soldier in the Indian War, and who, in July, 1777, enlisted in Captain Chase Taylor's company of volunteers from Sanbornton, and fought valiantly in the battle of Bennington. He was in service until September 18, 1777. He lives in the memory and traditions of Meredith as a man of more than ordinary gifts, fond of telling, both in and out of the pulpit, incidents of warlike experience. Tall, dark-complexioned, well-proportioned he was one who never thought it necessary to be stern, even in moments of religious excitement. He was thoroughly in earnest, however, and deeply impressed that he was a chosen instrument to preach the gospel to the pioneers. It is stated that he often started from home without his breakfast, preaching in Meredith, Monttonborough and Sandwich the same day, reaching home at night after a travel of almost forty miles, and going supperless to bed. This was his life for many years. After the ordination of his successor, Elder Fogg, Elder Folsom passed the remainder of his life upon his farm, where he died December, 1830, aged eighty-three years.

During the pastorate of Elder Folsom this society was incorporated, and became a legal body, as is shown by these documents.

The following is a copy of the petition of the Baptist Society for an incorporation, 1797.

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire convened at Concord June, 1797.

" DANIEL SMITH Jr Town Clerk"

The society was incorporated by an act passed December 14, 1797.

About the time Elder Folsom's health and powers declined, at a meeting held at the house of John Wadleigh, Parker Fogg was admitted to membership in the church by letter. He was a brilliant and enthusiastic young man and apparently zealous in building up the cause. Accordingly, it was voted to give him ordination, the exercises to take place in February, 1821, at the meeting-house in the Third Division. There is no record of the ordination. Elder Folsom died soon after, and Mr. Fogg became sole pastor.

" At first Elder Fogg was an acceptable preacher and instrumental in doing good; but he had inherited a strong appetite for intoxicating liquor, which proved his ruin and was the cause of great sorrow and trial to the church. After he had been pastor for a number of years it became evident that he lacked the powers of self-control, and indulged too freely in the use of intoxicants. Many became dissatisfied with him as pastor and declined to hear him preach. Noticing the change in the feelings of the membership towards him, he resigned his charge and engaged in missionary labor for the State Convention. The evil habit, however, increased upon him until it completely destroyed his usefulness as a minister. These and other complications served to check, to a great degree, the growth of the church." From 1824 to 1829 the organization appears to have been dormant, but in 1829 a number of students at the New Hampton Institution were zealous in the Master's cause and had a wish to labor in this town and some of the surrounding ones, in the hope of causing a revival. Among this number was an earnest and talented young man, afterward a successful evangelist, who visited this church and held protracted meetings. He was assisted by Elder Evans, by Elder James Barnaby, also a student and a man who figured conspicuously in the anti-Masonic excitement of the times, and by some of the local brethren. These meetings were the cause of great good to all the churches in the vicinity. On the 29th of October, 1829, a large number were baptized by Elder Evans. On the 21st of December, Lewis Caswell joined the church by letter, and it was voted to give him ordination, which was done on the 31st of January, 1830. Elder Caswell proved to be the right man in the right place, and the year that followed was one of the greatest blessings to the church of any in its history. In 1831 thirteen members withdrew to form the Second Baptist Church of Meredith, and in 1833 others withdrew to form the church at Piper's Mills. In 1833 a council was convened to consider the charges against Mr. Fogg, then still a member of the church. The charges, "intemperate habits," were sustained and he was deposed from the ministry. But Parson Fogg had many excellent qualities; he is remembered as a friendly, kind-hearted and sympathetic man. He had uncommon gifts; he once read a paper before a large assembly of ministers on "The connection of time with eternity," which created a profound impression. His memory should not be treated lightly, nor his habits be censured too severely. He lived at a time when the use of stimulants was more common than now; when they were less under the ban of society. Elder Caswell resigned after the deposition of Mr. Fogg. He was a man of exalted piety and highly regarded by his people. He was a strong, positive man, unbending and uncompromising in his views touching society affairs, and was one of the few New Hampshire preachers who, from 1827 to 1835, and later, were outspoken in their condemnation of Free-Masonry.

During 1834 and 1835 the church had no regular pastor. In December, 1835, the Rev. A. M. Swain, of Salem, N. Y., was engaged to preach. He remained about two years, the society showing a falling off in membership during his pastorate. In 1838 and 1839 the church was destitute of a pastor. In 1839 the church ordained the Rev. Barzilla Pierce as pastor. Elder Pierce remained until 1842. In 1843 the church was apparently in a prosperous condition. During the years of 1844 and 1845, Elder Chickering, of New Hampton, supplied one-third of the time, and two-thirds for the second or village church. The church struggled on for a year or more, but finding it impossible to sustain preaching, in 1846 disbanded by general consent. In justice, however, it should be said that "the good people who formed its membership through all these years seem to have striven to support the preaching of the gospel and to maintain a proper measure of discipline. That, after nearly seventy years of effort, they were compelled to disband was not their fault. Situated as the church was, half-way between the fast-growing villages of Meredith Bridge (now Lactonia) and Lake village on one side and Meredith on the other, the result was only a question of time. But the work that was done and the good accomplished will be recorded in the Lamb's Book of Life, and the record thereof shall not pass away like the things of this world, but will continue unto the end of time."

The Second Baptist Church was formed, during the revival of 1831, by thirteen members of the First Baptist Church. The petition was signed by Benjamin R. Rollins and eighteen others, and on the 30th of May the request was granted. On the 1st of June the petitioners met and formed themselves into a church. At this meeting they voted to call an ecclesiastical council to assemble June 15th, which was done; the council convened and the organization completed according to denominational custom. The sermon was preached by the Rev. William Taylor, who preached for the church two years, the services being held at the Towle Hill meeting-house. In the mean time the society voted to build a meeting-house of brick, and Elder Taylor selected the location, and the church was built "upon a rock," and although a large undertaking for so small a society, yet it was completed, and some years since entirely paid for. In 1834 the church settled its first pastor, Rev. Christy G. Wheeler, who, on account of failing health, resigned. Mr. Daniel Mattison then supplied, and in December, 1836, he was ordained; but in November, 1840, he died, leaving a character of most earnest piety. He is remembered also as a man of promise and power. For a year or two after Mr. Mattison's death the pulpit was supplied by New Hampton students; but in January, 1842, a call was extended to Rev. Samuel Eastman, which was accepted, but he resigned at the end of the year, not being fully Calvinistic in his views. His pastorate, however, was a successful one, inasmuch as there were many additions to the church. From that time until 1845 there was no settled pastor; then Rev. Samuel Cook was ordained and remained with the church until April, 1849, when he resigned. Some time between the years 1845 and 1849 the church solicited and received aid from the State Convention. Elder Cook was a very earnest man, and gained the affection of his people. In May, 1849, the Rev. E. W. Cressy, of Concord, became pastor, but owing to the dissension in the church, arising from the revision of the church creed, his labors were of no avail, and December, 1850, he resigned. After that there was occasional preaching; then the house was closed.

In 1852, Rev. Stephen G. Abbott offered to preach if the people would open the house. His offer was accepted, and he was acting pastor until 1855, and the people have reason to think of him and his services with gratitude.

In 1856, Rev. George Daland, of South Braintree, Mass., was settled; but at this time the slavery question was the disturbing element of the country, and the church was not exempt from its influence, and in 1858, Mr. Daland closed his pastorate in Meredith.

The following two years the church was without a pastor.

About 1860 the title Second Baptist Church (there being no First Church then existing) was changed to Meredith Village Baptist Church.

In 1861, Rev. Nathaniel Goodhue was pastor; but, in the fall of 1863, he desired his dismissal, as he was no longer in accord with the tenets of the denomination. He was followed by Rev. H. I. Campbell, who remained about two years.

Rev. Joseph Storer became pastor in February, 1866, and served until 1872, building up the cause zealously. During this time the church edifice was repaired. Following his resignation the church was closed, but from 1873 to the fall of 1875 the pulpit was supplied by efficient preachers of the gospel, when Rev. William H. Stewart took charge of the church and Sunday-school, and by his fervor and zeal revived the local interests of the parish.

Mr. Stewart was a chaplain in the navy and was compelled to resign at the end of two years, being ordered to report for duty.

Rev. T. M. Merriman was pastor from 1877 to 1879.

The next pastor was Rev. James Graham, who supplied for the church from January to May, 1879, when he was regularly ordained.

Mr. Graham resigned July, 1884 and January, 1885, Rev. S. P. Everett, the present pastor, became his successor.

He is a man possessing characteristics which should win for him success in his chosen field of labor. Quick, energetic, with pleasing manners and of sound doctrinal faith, the church bids fair to go on and prosper under his earnest teachings. The resident membership of the church in 1884 was eighty. The Sabbath-school had one hundred and sixty scholars and fourteen teachers.

The Free-Will Baptist Church.—The Free-Will Baptist Church of Meredith had its origin in this town in the year 1800. Elder Simon Pottle, of Middleton,—a ready speaker, but wanting in caution, which finally proved his ruin,—came into that part of the town now known as Oak Hill, about two and a half miles from the village, and held some meetings. At the first meeting, as the record runs, "seven professed to be brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. The work increased in a most glorious manner." This was in August of that year. September 3d, Elder Richard Martin, of Gilford, came and baptized fourteen persons, viz.: Robert Smith, Abigail Smith, Polly Smith, William Pike, Phebe Pike, Nancy Pike, Rebecca Pease, Rebecca Pease (2d), Robert Pease, Nathaniel Pease, Simeon Pease, Theodore Hart, Peter Peters and Sally Sinclair. On the 23d of the same month he baptized eleven more. The next day Elder Pottle baptized a few. Baptisms were frequent there and in Centre Harbor. It is probable the form of the organization took place at the first baptism under the name of "Monthly Meeting of Meredith," and was regarded a branch of the New Durham mother-church. This took place September 3, 1800, as the record of the second baptism (September 23d) says, "and were added to this Monthly Meeting." At their first monthly meeting, October 11th, after their organization, Simeon Pease—years after chosen deacon—was appointed clerk. At that meeting they petitioned the Quarterly Meeting, held the next week at New Durham, to be recognized and constituted a Monthly Meeting. Thirty-three signed the petition, being the then members of the meeting. The following Wednesday, the Quarterly-Meeting convened and their request was granted, and they were received and recognized as a Monthly Meeting and a branch of the New Durham Church. The name, then, of the community of churches was "Free-Will Anti-Pedo Baptists." The notice of the Quarterly Meeting's action was signed by Elder John Shepard, moderator, and Elder Benjamin Randall, clerk. They adopted the "Order and Discipline of the New Durham Church," (the first church organized by Elder Randall, the founder of the Free-Will Baptist denomination, in 1780). This "Order and Discipline" recognized for officers, teaching elders, ruling elders, deacons, wardens, treasurer and clerk. The teaching elders were preachers. The ruling elders were to have the oversight of the church, and, in the absence of a preaching elder, could administer the ordinances. "They must be plain in dress and temperate in living;" they were to "improve their gifts," and, frequently, they became preachers. The deacons, in addition to their proper duties, could administer the ordinances in the absence of a teaching and ruling elder. They also were to exercise their gifts. Wardens were to look after the finances, assessing and collecting taxes for church purposes. The record of the first Monthly Meeting after the Quarterly Meeting recognition says,—

"Opposed the meeting with repeated petitions to Almighty God for His assistance and direction in the duties of the day, and He was pleased to answer, to our souls' great joy and satisfaction. All glory to His Heavenly Name! Each member present related the travail of his mind to great satisfaction, with firm resolutions to press on towards the glorious work. Our meeting continued until about eleven o'clock in the evening, with strong cries and groanings in travail for the prosperity of Zion, that her gates might be crowded with converts! We have cause to say it was good for us to meet together, for Zion's God was with us of a truth, and His Almighty power was made manifest in a wonderful manner. Then concluded with a few songs of praise to our Governor and King!"

Their "Order and Discipline" required the meeting to report to the Quarterly Meeting every session by delegates, and to present the book of records for inspection. Labor was carried on with disorderly and delinquent members by the meeting, but "rejection" was by the Quarterly Meeting. A letter was made out and forwarded to the party excluded, signed by the moderator and clerk of the meeting.

This form of organization went on for a while, till the meeting requested the Quarterly Meeting to allow them full power to manage their own affairs, and their request was granted. In April following the organization, John Knowles, of Centre Harbor, was chosen ruling elder, and Nicholas Smith, of New Hampton, deacon; and, subsequently, they were ordained as such. Afterwards (1803) Theodore Hart was appointed ruling elder, and Daniel Veasey deacon.

The religious interest at the beginning continued, and frequent baptisms were had until, on the 1st of January, the meeting numbered fifty-six. The work gradually spread over this and adjoining towns till the membership embraced not only Meredith, but New Hampton, Centre Harbor and Centre Harbor Neck, Holderness, Moultonborough and Moultonborough Neck. At the end of the second year the meeting numbered one hundred and thirty-four. Subsequently it numbered more than double, if not three, that number.

The meetings in their early history were characterized by great religious fervor and power. Not infrequently persons were known to possess so much "power" as to lose consciousness and would remain in this state for hours. All understood this; no one was alarmed or thought it strange. There were seasons of spiritual agony called a travail of soul. Often conversions took place at these meetings.

The record of an adjourned meeting held at Wadleigh Cran's, Centre Harbor, February 20, 1801, says,—

"We found it to be a meeting place, indeed, for Jesus was with us, and so blessed our souls, that, for a long time, there was a shouting like men filled with wine. A number of our young converts, who were about four months old, were filled with the spirit of prophecy and spoke with new tongues, declaring the house of Saul waxes weaker and the house of David stronger. Glory to God!"

Their Christian zeal and love, and readiness in obeying the commands of Christ, are seen by a record of a meeting for baptism, held at William Clark's, in Centre Harbor, January 28th, just previous to the above-mentioned meeting, when Elder Pottle baptized three through the ice at the head of Waukawan Lake, the ice being two feet in thickness.

When without a preacher they conducted their meetings among themselves, the ruling elder presiding. The meeting soon covered so large a territory that branch ones were formed, which monthly reported to the parent. The first year a class was formed on Centre Harbor Hill, under the care of Ruling Elder J. Knowles, which afterwards grew into a church. The next year a branch meeting was formed on Moultonborough Neck. The following year, 1803, one was formed in the "Second Division" of Meredith, ultimately becoming a church now in existence. Some time after, one was formed in the west part of Centre Harbor and Holderness. Still later, another church sprang up in East Holderness. In 1838 a church was formed at the village out of the old church. In 1859 another one was formed out of its membership on Meredith Neck, which, in 1843, was largely broken up, and which finally became extinct. Thus reduced in membership and territory, the mother-church became small and feeble. This church has had a wide-spread influence. It has had much to do with moulding the religious sentiment and opinions of this region, and in gathering men out of sin. A house of worship was built between 1800 and 1804, not long after the establishment of the meeting. In later years it was remodeled into the form it now has. The church had not in those early years a stated ministry, for a settled pastor was then hardly known in this denomination. The supply was mostly by traveling preachers; yet, at a comparatively early date, this church had stated supplies and pastors. Among the first preachers were Pottle, Martin, Magoon, Dana and Colby. Later were Moody, Hill, Manson, Stevens, the Pottingills, Perkins, Welber, Sanborn, Knowles, Jackson, Moulton, Sinclair and Veasey. Its experience has been varied. For a number of years its prosperity was far beyond anything now known in a country place, numbering its membership to three hundred and fifty-two. Then there were seasons of "low-tide." Although so many churches and societies have been formed out of its membership and territory, still it lives, though greatly reduced in size.

In 1832 the Sixth General Conference of the denomination was held with this church. There was a large attendance. The business was transacted at the Pease School-house, and the worship conducted at the church and in the adjacent grove. Of the delegates attending, Rev. S. Curtis, of Concord, still survives. Of the large number of ministers present, not delegates, Rev. J. Woodman, Rev. D. Jackson and Rev. D. P. Ciley and perhaps others are now living.

The present pastor of the old (Oak Hill) church is the venerable and faithful Rev. J. Erskine, to whose courtesy we are indebted for the above valuable sketch.

The Meredith Village Free-Will Baptist Church was organized October 18, 1838. The council was composed of the following brethren: Peter Clark, Hiram Stevens, E. Mack, D. Pettingill, H. Webber and E. Wiley. Peter Clark was chairman and E. Mack scribe.

A communication was presented to this council from the First Free-Will Church in Meredith (Oak Hill), setting forth the action of that church and the granting of letters of dismission to fifty-four members of that church for the purpose of organizing a church at Meredith village. With these persons we find the names of Daniel Smith, David Vittum and John Haynes.

The organization was completed and rules were adopted, taking the Holy Scriptures as their guide in faith and doctrine, and a very decided position on the temperance question. David Vittum and John Haynes were chosen deacons, and Josiah C. Vittum clerk. A request was made to the Sandwich Quarterly Meeting for admission to that body, which was granted. Elder Hiram Stevens, an extemporaneous speaker of force and ability, acted as pastor until June 20, 1839, at which time Rev. Hosea Quimby became pastor, and remained until some time during the year 1842. He was a quiet, effective speaker, whose sermons appealed to the best elements of his hearers. In November, 1842, I. D. Stewart was invited to preach for a time, and soon after was ordained as pastor of the church. During the following year thirty-four were baptized and united with the church, the number of members at this time being one hundred and four. About the first of the year 1844, Mr. Stewart was dismissed. There is no record of the church after Rev. Mr. Stewart's dismissal until December 21, 1846, when it was thought best to give up the organization and return to Oak Hill Church, which was done.

May 25, 1851, by request, previous to this date, the Sandwich Quarterly Meeting had appointed the following as a council to come to Meredith village and organize a church: Rev. L. B. Tasker, Rev. P. S. Burbank and Rev. J. Rannels. A church was organized with the following members: David Vittum, Daniel Smith, John Haynes, Francis Hawkins, John How, Mooney Baker, Greenleaf Malbon, Ebenezer Stevens and David P. Cotton. The officers were David P.

Cotton, clerk; David Vittum and John Haynes, deacons; and it was voted to take the name of "Meredith Village Free-Will Baptist Church," and it was subsequently received by the Sandwich Quarterly Meeting as a member of that body. The confession of faith and church covenant of the denomination was adopted.

January, 1855, Rev. Hosea Quimby was settled as pastor, and remained until January, 1857. About this time the hall where they worshipped was destroyed by fire, and for several years there was no settled pastor.

In 1858 the society commenced to build a church. There was standing on the "Parade" a meeting-house, erected in the year 1776. This building the proprietor kindly gave to the society. It was removed to the village and rebuilt during the following year.

June 26, 1861, A. B. Meservey was ordained, and was pastor until April, 1862, when he resigned the pastorate to become the principal of New Hampton Institution. July 17, 1862, Rev. L. B. Tasker was called to the pastorate and remained until April 26, 1863; soon after Rev. Francis Reed became pastor and was dismissed June 11, 1865. In April, 1866, Rev. J. Erskine was settled as pastor. May 10, 1866, James McLean and J. S. Vittum were chosen deacons. In June, 1869, the New Hampshire Yearly Meeting held its sessions with this church. Rev. Mr. Erskine was dismissed November, 1870, and J. H. Durkee was ordained September 28, 1871, and settled as pastor. November, 1871, Alvah Cotton and H. F. Hawkins were chosen deacons, and in September, 1872, Rev. Mr. Durkee was dismissed. Rev. L. Given was pastor from February 27, 1873, to September 16, 1875, and from this time until May, 1878, the society depended on supplies, and meetings were sustained only a part of the time. August 16, 1878, Rev. R. H. Tozer became pastor; was dismissed June 13, 1880. From September 11, 1880, to April 6, 1882, Rev. N. S. Palmeter was pastor. In April, 1882, Rev. J. Burnham Davis became pastor, and in September, 1882, John Holsden was elected deacon.

During the fall of 1883 the society built a chapel at a cost of nine hundred dollars, and in the spring of 1884 the church was repaired and remodeled at an expense of sixteen hundred dollars, the seating capacity of the church being increased one-third. The church and chapel are very pleasantly and neatly fitted up, much taste being shown in all their appointments. It is now a model building for a small society.

The house was rededicated July 3, 1884. May 16, 1885, Rev. Mr. Davis was dismissed. Since its last organization there have been two hundred and sixty-six members connected with the church, and at the present time the society is in a prosperous condition. The Sabbath-school has always been considered of vital importance and its interests receive proper attention.

members were Frank P. Carey, Howard F. Hill, John A. Lang, Thomas B. Nichols, Alvin Peavey, Marvin C. Brown, Brad R. Dearborn, R. Freeman Sandborn.

Officers first year (nine months): F. P. Carey, N. G.; Alvin Peavey, V. G.; B. R. Dearborn, Sec.; J. A. Lang, Treas.

1880.—Officers: first term, A. Peavey, N. G.; I. C. Boynton, V. G.; B. R. Dearborn, Sec.; J. A. Lang, Treas. Second term, I. C. Boynton, N. G.; B. R. Dearborn, V. G.; D. A. Ambrose, Sec.; J. A. Lang, Treas.

1881.—Officers: first term, B. R. Dearborn, N. G.; D. A. Ambrose, V. G.; F. P. Carey, Sec.; J. A. Lang, Treas. Second term, D. A. Ambrose, N. G.; W. M. Rand, V. G.; F. P. Carey, Sec.; I. C. Boynton, Treas.

1882.—Officers: first term, W. M. Rand, N. G.; G. H. Norris, V. G.; F. P. Carey, Sec.; I. C. Boynton, Treas. Second term, G. H. Norris, N. G.; T. J. Sinclair, V. G.; D. A. Vittum, Sec.; J. D. Bartlett, Treas.

1883.—Officers: first term, T. J. Sinclair, N. G.; J. D. Bartlett, V. G.; F. W. Elliott, Sec.; F. W. Smith, Treas. Second term, J. D. Bartlett, N. G.; James Graham, V. G.; P. A. Ellsworth, Sec.; F. W. Smith, Treas.

1884.—Officers: first term, J. Graham, N. G.; P. A. Ellsworth, V. G.; A. M. Black, Sec.; F. W. Smith, Treas. Second term, P. A. Ellsworth, N. G.; C. W. Maloon, V. G.; A. M. Black, Sec.; F. W. Smith, Treas.

1885.—Officers: first term, B. R. Dearborn, N. G.; A. M. Black, V. G.; D. A. Vittum, Sec.; F. W. Smith, Treas.

This lodge has furnished three District Deputies—F. B. Carey, Alvin Peavey and J. D. Bartlett. Present number of members, fifty-seven. Meetings weekly, Monday evenings.

GEORGE S. CRAM POST, No. 54, G. A. R.—This post was chartered June 26, 1880. The charter members were Levi Leach, Horace W. Clark, Joseph W. Lang, Jr., George K. James, Charles H. Perkins, John S. Piper, Cyrene Bixby, John P. Kendrick, Phillip McCrillis, Stephen K. Philbrick, Alden A. Kidder, John R. Quimby, Alvah Cotton, John E. Locke, Frank D. Clark, George G. Badger.

The first Commander was Captain J. W. Lang, Jr., late of the Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers. Nearly all of the members comprising this post served in the Twelfth Regiment. The present membership is forty-eight. The Past Commanders are J. W. Lang, Jr., George Dallison and C. C. Whittier. Regular encampment, Friday evening of each week. It has a small post fund and a relief fund. Present Commander, Phillip McCrillis; Quartermaster, George K. James; W. B. Reynolds, Adjutant. The post was named in honor of George S. Cram, Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers, who was killed at the battle of Chancellorsville.

GEORGE S. CRAM RELIEF CORPS, No. 2.—Auxiliary to the G. A. R. Meetings, every other Monday evening, 7:30 o'clock. Kate Cram, president; Maria P. Kendrick, Sec.

WILLIAM S. LEACH CAMP, No. 3, SONS OF VETERANS.—Through the earnest labors of a prominent comrade of George S. Cram Post, G. A. R., ten of the patriotic sons of veteran soldiers who were entitled to the benefits of the Order of Sons of Veterans signed an application for a charter and secured the third charter issued for New Hampshire, which gave the camp the privilege of recommending a major for the State Division of the order. The charter members were Francis H. Cram, Albert A. Kidder, Frank L. Hartshorn, W. E. McPherson, E. E. Kendrick, Warren B. Jencks, Fred L. Hawkins, Harry L. Fernal, Fred B. Wilson, George H. Thurston.

The camp was instituted Thursday evening, March 14, 1883, Lieutenant-Colonel E. A. Badger, of Lake village, acting as installing officer. Francis H. Cram was installed captain, and he has been followed by Brothers George H. Thurston, Albert A. Kidder and W. E. McPherson, the present incumbent. The camp now numbers twenty-two members in good standing, with a future which is indeed encouraging, although at present the brothers are largely scattered throughout the Union. Francis H. Cram is now serving as Lieutenant-Commander of the New Hampshire Division.

The camp was presented, May 30, 1885, with a fine portrait of William S. Leach, whose name the camp commemorates. This was the gift of Levi and Edward Leach, father and brother of the gallant soldier-boy.

Meredith is the banner temperance town of the State. For the population, it has the largest number of enrolled troops against the traffic in and use of intoxicating drink, and to-day the temperance forces are strong and well equipped. No concealed or "winked-at" traffic in ardent spirits is allowed within the limits of the town, and, though the battle has been a severely-fought one, the friends of true progress can feel themselves encouraged by the present outlook.

There are three temperance organizations in Meredith,—

WACKAWAN LODGE, No. 9, I. O. G. T., of Meredith village, was organized July 26, 1865, with thirty-three members. It has, with but few exceptions, held weekly meetings to the present time. It has had over three hundred different members, and has now a membership of fifty-nine, all active and energetic workers. There are only three of the charter members now connected with the lodge,—James M. Bedee (now Lodge Deputy and Treasurer), Mary E. Bedee and Mrs. Lizzie P. Lang. Meets Thursday evenings, weekly.

WHITE MOUNTAIN LODGE, No. 73, I. O. G. T., of Meredith Centre, was organized March 29, 1883, with the following officers: Rev. George Pinkham, W. C.; Mrs. S. E. M. Pinkham, W. V. T.; N. B. Plummer, Treas.; Ida Batchelder, W. F. S.; Mrs. Mary M. Cate, W. L. S.; Mrs. H. L. Pitman, W. R. S.; Amos K. Yeasey, W. Chaplain; Fred. L. Batchelder, W. O. G.; George L. P. Corliss, P. W. C. T.; Frank A. Arnold, W. M.; Annie Hill, W. D. M.; Lodge Deputies: 1883-84, George L. P. Corliss; 1885, A. K. Yeasey. Weekly meetings, Friday evening. This has been a remarkably lively lodge, having had at times as high as one hundred and forty-five members, and now numbers ninety-two. The Worthy Chiefs from organization have been Rev. George Pinkham, J. H. Robinson, A. K. Yeasey, J. H. Albright, W. H. Cate, N. B. Plummer, John Webster, D. S. Corliss and N. G. Plummer.

THE BLUE RIBBON CLUB, organized in 1879, was inaugurated by Messrs. Booth and Smith, February 16, 1879. It has held meetings nearly every Sunday evening since that date, numbers about two thousand three hundred members on its roll, and, in connection with the Good Templars, is doing a fine work. Meetings, Sunday evenings, at the town hall.

THE MEREDITH MECHANIC ASSOCIATION was incorporated in 1859. The incorporators were Joseph W. Lang, Ebenezer Stevens, Joseph Ela, James P. F. Smith, Hanson Beede and John W. Beede, with their associates, successors and assigns. The first officers were elected July 8, 1859, as follows: Joseph Ela, president and agent; J. W. Ela, clerk; J. W. Lang, treasurer; Ebenezer Stevens, John F. Barron, Seneca A. Ladd, Daniel Smith, directors.

Mr. Ela resigned his office September 3, 1859, on account of ill health, and Ebenezer Stevens was elected to serve the remainder of the year, when Mr. Ela was again elected and served as president and agent until 1871. George G. Hoyt was then elected president and he now holds the office. Joseph W. Lang was treasurer until 1861; Ebenezer Stevens, from 1861 to 1862; J. W. Lang, from 1862 to 1863, when S. W. Rollins was appointed and served until 1871; Seneca A. Ladd was then elected treasurer, and appointed agent, and he has since filled these offices.

The property held by the association consists of all the water-power afforded by Waukawan Lake, in one fall of forty-two feet to Winnepesaukee Lake, three factory buildings, three shops, one store and three houses.

The capital stock was at first twenty thousand dollars, which, by vote of the stockholders, might be increased to not exceeding fifty thousand dollars. In 1861, by vote, it was raised to twenty-five thousand dollars, and January 18, 1871, to thirty-five thousand dollars, this being the present amount of capital stock, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, and held by forty persons. Dividends, averaging from the commencement four and a half per cent. per annum, have been paid. It is out of debt and paying a dividend of two per cent. semi-annually.

The present officers are: President and Clerk, George G. Hoyt; Treasurer and Agent, Seneca A. Ladd; Directors, G. G. Hoyt, J. W. Beede, J. H. Plaisted, Samuel Hodgson, Ebenezer Stevens.

The Meredith Village Savings-Bank was incorporated June, 1869, with the following incorporators: Joseph W. Lang, Seneca A. Ladd, Joseph Ela, J. W. Lang, Jr., C. S. Prescott, Ebenezer Stevens, N. B. Wadleigh, John W. Beede, Isaiah Winch, George Sanborn, George M. Burleigh, J. S. Neal, J. H. Prescott, C. P. Towle, George G. Hoyt, Charles L. Hoyt, J. M. Beede, D. S. Beede, A. E. Leavitt and S. D. Pease.

October 4, 1869, the first meeting was held, at which time Joseph W. Lang was chosen president; Seneca A. Ladd, treasurer and secretary; and the same two persons have been elected to the same offices every year since. At an adjourned meeting, held October 7, 1869, the following names were added as incorporators: D. S. Metcalf, Charles Smith, R. S. Keneson, W. H. H. Mason and C. P. St. Clair. At this time a board of trustees were chosen as follows: Joseph Ela, John W. Beede, Charles Smith, J. M. Beede, C. S. Prescott, S. D. Pease, R. S. Keneson, William H. H. Mason, George G. Hoyt and C. P. St. Clair.

This bank has been very successful from the first. Its officers have all been practical men, and only those who were successful in their private business. Its deposits—the first of one hundred dollars, on November 10, 1869, by Mrs. J. P. Lang—have steadily increased to three hundred and thirty thousand dollars, a guarantee fund of sixteen thousand dollars and unvisited profit of twenty thousand dollars. There is no paper held known to be bad or doubtful, and no principal or interest overdue. July 1, 1870, it declared an interest dividend of two and a half per cent., and has repeated the same rate every six months since, and during the same time has paid four extra dividends.

The president, possessing much valuable experience, and having long been a model business man,—at all times in the right place,—has rendered valuable aid.

The treasurer, fully understanding the true object of a savings-bank, has faithfully and impartially attended to his important duties.

The finance committee are practical men, with much veneration for law and precedents, are well qualified for the business and ever attentive to duty.

The present active officers are Joseph W. Lang, president; Seneca A. Ladd, treasurer; Samuel W. Rollins, John W. Beede, Ebenezer Stevens, finance committee.

The Meredith Weekly News.—The first paper published in Meredith since the division of the town was established July 22, 1880, by George F. Sanborn, who still controls it. Since its advent it has been enlarged the third time, in the mean time changing its name to the Meredith News. It is now published—folio form of thirty-two columns—independent in character and politics. Prosperous and with an increasing circulation, the paper bids fair to become one of the permanent institutions of the town.

The Meredith Public Library and Reading Room adjoins the office of the News and is under the management of George F. Sanborn. The library was established March, 1882, by subscription and donation of books from John Smith, Jr., of Boston, and others who contributed liberally. An appropriation by the town has given it an addition of many valuable works, making in all about ten thousand volumes. It has now a solid basis, and is well patronized.

March 13, 1883, Aaron T. Clough, George G. Hoyt, George F. Sanborn, E. P. Robinson and N. B. Plummer were appointed trustees.

CHAPTER X.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Colonel Ebenezer Smith—Education—Early Votes of the Town Concerning "Schooling"—"Master Leavitt"—School-Houses at Meredith Village—Number of School Districts and Attendance of Scholars, 1884-85—First Singing-School—Dudley Leavitt—Early Navigation—First Steamboat—Early Business Men of Meredith Village—Meredith Parade—A Curious Relic—Conclusion.

COLONEL EBENEZER SMITH was, above all others, the principal man of the early days of Meredith. He was proprietors' clerk, first town clerk (both positions were held many years), justice of the peace and selectmen for a long period of time, first representative to the General Court, colonel of the First Regiment of militia, and often received all the votes cast in the town for offices of honor and trust, such as Senator and Presidential elector. Making his home in the town in the spring of 1766, he was almost alone in the wilderness, and the old record-books show him to have been the genius of the improvement of the settlement, and the good people of Meredith to-day owe much to the shrewd practicality, strong common sense, business ability and earnest labor of this old pioneer. He is allowed, September 2, 1765, £6 12s. 3d. for cutting road and building bridge. November 3d. he received eighteen pounds for work on saw-mill, and thirty pounds for settling rights. He was autocratic and controlled the infant town as a Czar his realm, but his rule was for the public good. For example, when the assessors would meet to fix the taxes, he would say, "Put such an one down for an amount much less than the assessment on his valuation; he has been sick, had poor crops or has lost an ox," etc. Another settler, who had had good fortune, he would tax a larger amount than the assessment. Never was his decision appealed from, nor was there any appeal. He would meet angry neighbors who were going to the "Bridge" for the law against some one, and authoritatively turn them towards home, and thus prevented strife and lawsuits. He was truly a great man. He died August 22, 1807, leaving numerous descendants.

Education.—In a quiet manner the people of Meredith have paid attention from the first to the educational interests of the town. April 5, 1773, it was "Voted to raise the sum of six Spanish milled dollars for to hire schooling the present year, and not to build a school [house] this present year." In the same year we find Jeremiah Smith credited "by cash paid Jonathan Smith for schooling, £16."

March 19, 1778, the town took action to build three school-houses, and also "that the selectmen shall make tax on the said districts to pay the cost of building, after the houses are completed," and voted for eight months' school. Up to this time, and for several years the amount annually voted by the town for school purposes was usually five pounds. Some years later there was no school and the money raised increased the length of time taught the ensuing year. Four months in each year there was usually a school. One of the most celebrated of the early teachers was Dudley Leavitt, of abunant fame, whose reputation as a mathematician and astronomer extended to the scientific circles of Europe. His first school was taught in a house standing on the corner of a lot now owned by C. C. Whittier, near the Prospect House, on the old road from Meredith village to Centre Harbor. In digging for a foundation of a bank-wall, about May 1, 1885, Mr. Whittier came upon the foundation of the old school-house. Mr. Leavitt afterwards taught school on Meredith Parade. In 1800 the town raised three hundred dollars for schools. March 12, 1804, the town "Voted to raise four hundred dollars for the use of schooling the ensuing year." We cannot find the record of any action of the town at any period of its history increasing that amount.

The school-house at Meredith village was located on Plymouth Street, where a house was erected, which, becoming too small, in time, for the number of scholars, was succeeded, somewhere about 1840, by a larger house of two rooms, which was occupied until the completion of the present school building. June 27, 1871, John Wadleigh, Hosea S. Swain and Edward F. Wiggin, school committee, located the site for the present school building on land belonging to Colonel Ebenezer Stevens, and appraised the value of the site at eight hundred and thirty-three dollars. The building was at once erected and occupied.

From reports of school committee and Board of Education for the year ending March 1, 1885, we find seventeen school districts in town, the one at Meredith village having a graded school of four departments. The total number of scholars attending school during the year was three hundred and sixty-four. Of these, one hundred and ninety were on the rolls of the graded school.

THE FIRST SINGING-SCHOOL in the town was taught nearly one hundred years ago (1795) by Deacon Josiah Perkins, father of John Perkins, now of Meredith village.

DUDLEY LEAVITT.—This noted astronomer, school teacher and almanac-maker was for years an honored character of Meredith. His fame extended to European countries, and it is related that one of the French savans, who visited his plain abode, was much surprised at the simplicity of the surroundings, as he expected to find an imposing mansion instead of a pioneer cabin, and when he learned that the annual revenue of Mr. Leavitt amounted to seventy-five dollars, and that "he had all he wanted," he could not understand in the slightest degree such Spartan qualities as he saw exhibited.

For many years Dudley Leavitt drew many from long distances to avail themselves of the great advantages of his tuition. His "Farmers' Almanac" occupied, next to the Bible, the honored place in New Hampshire homes. It is doubtful whether any other person has had so much to do with the intellectual development of Meredith, or so impressed his personality upon its people. The few now living who were his pupils speak of him with veneration. To have received instruction from "Master Leavitt" was as satisfactory in educational requirements at that time as a college diploma would be to-day.

Early Navigation on Lake Winnepesaukee.—During the early history of this vicinity great difficulty was experienced by the settlers in transporting goods and household necessities from the distant markets of Dover and Portsmouth. The roads consisted only of "bridle-paths," which were only wide enough for a single horse, and all the articles had to be carried upon horseback, or oftener on the backs of the settlers themselves. At last they got tired of these means of transportation, and constructed a road from Dover to Alton Bay about the commencement of the present century. From Alton Bay the supplies were distributed to this section by means of boats, and, almost simultaneously with the construction of this road, the old "Gundalow" boat was built by one Smith, of Dover, to carry the goods and passengers across the lake to their point of destination. This was a huge, flat-bottomed, unwieldy craft, propelled by sail, if the wind was favorable, and when it was not, by large oars. It ran no regular trips, but visited the Weirs, Meredith village, Centre Harbor and several other points when necessary. After running a number of years it was "shipwrecked" on "Great Boat Ledge" in a heavy gale.

In 1830 a stock company was formed for the purpose of building a steamboat, and work was soon after commenced upon it at Lake village, and it was completed in 1832. Great difficulty was experienced in getting up through the channel at the Weirs, on account of the low water. Like the old "Gundalow," it ran no regular trips, visiting all points on the lake when necessary. It was about one hundred feet in length, and flat-bottomed. The engine was in no way in proportion to the size of the boat, in head winds hardly able to hold its own, and making a noise that could be heard for miles. The time employed in making the trip between Alton Bay and Centre Harbor, when the wind was favorable, was nearly six hours. Now the time made between these two points is two hours, regardless of wind or weather. Captain W. A. Sanborn, of the Weirs, was her captain, and Perkins Drake, of Lake village, her pilot. In the month of November, 1841, the steamboat was wrecked on what is now known as Steamboat Island. Other steamers were soon after built, and run upon the lake, among which were the "Red Hill," the "Seneca," the "Union" and the "Lady."

Early Business Men of Meredith Village.—According to the venerable Joseph Ela, the merchants, in 1822, when he came here to establish a store for Joseph Smith, which he did near the present residence of J. A. Lang, were J. B. Swasey, whose store was opposite the residence of Colonel Ebenezer Stevens; John Towle, an old merchant, kept in the next block towards the post-office from the present Masonic Hall; Samuel Gilman, who occupied what is now the post-office building; Samuel Bean, located where the meat-market now stands; Captain Badger's tan-yard was where Mr. Hodgson's factory is now; Mr. Moulton was a cloth-dresser and manufacturer, after the primitive manner of that period. The lawyers were Esquire Harper, Jonathan C. Everett and later, Judge Lovell. The principal physician was Dr. John Sanborn, a man of great value, not only as a physician, but who is remembered as one who did more to inculcate a desire for knowledge in the minds of the youth than, perhaps, any other person who ever lived here.

Meredith Parade.—Among the places in this section which has a claim to historical mention, none has a more interesting history than that of Meredith Parade.

Shortly after the close of the War of 1812-15 with Great Britain, the State militia was thoroughly reorganized, and every competent man between the ages of eighteen and forty-five belonged to it. The companies of Meredith, Centre Harbor, New Hampton and Sandornton comprised the Twenty-Ninth Regiment, numbering over five hundred men. The law required that they should meet at some place as often as once a year for drill. The place selected for this purpose was known as Meredith Parade. The grounds were used for this purpose until about the year 1840, and became famous throughout the country for its annual gatherings.

These musters were looked upon as events of great importance. "Each soldier," as the law read, "was commanded to appear armed and equipped, said equipments to consist of a gun, two flints, a priming-wire and brush, a knapsack and twenty-four rounds of cartridges." Soldiers who failed to put in an appearance were charged a heavy fine, unless they could give a reasonable excuse. Two old-time "taverns" and two stores furnished the crowds with rations and the—at that time—indispensable article known as New England rum. Many old Revolutionary veterans, who had participated in the battles from Lexington to Yorktown would be attracted hither. Old Indian-fighters were also plenty and fond of relating their hair-breadth encounters with the red men of this locality. The old Parade occupied an important place in the early annals as the town metropolis. Besides the two taverns and two stores already mentioned, it had one meeting-house, which stood on the Parade-ground, near the line between this town and Laconia. This old church, with its high-backed seats, box-shaped pulpit with sounding-board, was moved to Meredith village and remodeled into the Free-Will Baptist Church. The old cemetery still remains, a mournful reminder of the past. The head-stones have nearly all fallen, and are moss-grown and broken; but few are legible. With the advent of the railroad perished the glory of the Parade. The daily stage from Boston to Plymouth was discontinued, and at the present time but little is left to distinguish it from any peaceful farming community.

The "Neck" and "Bear Island" were another community in themselves. Many recollect the hardy old-time residents of the Neck, although hardly one is left. "Bear Island" owes its name to the fact that bears were very abundant at the time of the first settlement. Robert Bryant settled here during the Revolution, coming from the Wadleigh place, near the Parade. Soon quite a neighborhood grew up around him, and forty years ago it could boast quite a school district. "Aunt Dolly" Nichols was a noted character, who lived alone about midway the length of the island. She made a living by selling cider and rum to the boatmen and fishermen. She bore the reputation of being a witch, and furnished Scribner a subject for his Dolly Plot in the "Legends of Laconia."

A Curious Relic was discovered in 1872, about six feet below the surface of the ground, at the bottom of a post-hole dug in the trail of the Indians between Lakes Winnepesaukee and Waukawan. It may have been the work of some one living in pre-historic days, as nothing like its fine workmanship has been produced by the Indian tribes of this locality, and it has attracted great attention from the scientific and ethnological world. This curiosity is of fine silicious sandstone, as hard as granite, of almost the size and shape of a goose egg,—longest diameter, three and three-fourths inches; transverse, two and five-eighths; weight, eighteen ounces,—but not a lathe product, deviating slightly from a "solid of revolution." A conical hole (three-eighths of an inch at base, one-eighth at summit) passes along the axis, but lacks nearly one-eighth of an inch of being concentric with the base, and less at the summit. Ten figures—some in low relief, but sunk below the surface,—are cut with a workmanship inferior to the gems of ancient Europe, but as much superior to any other ever found on this continent. For instance, in the ear of maize, seven-eighths of an inch long, there are seventeen kernels in the row, and four of the rows clearly visible, with two more partly in sight. In a circle below (nearer the broad end) is the scalp of an animal with large ears, a deer's leg, and another figure like a three-pointed cap. The scalp may be also a cap. To the right is a face in an oval, two and one-eighth inches long and five-eighths broad. This resembles strongly ancient Egyptian countenances. The face is sunken, as the nose does not rise above the regular surface. The next figure is an Indian lodge of four poles, visible above where they cross at the top. Three breadths of curtain are shown, and they are carefully roughened, as if of hides. This is not on a depressed surface. Below this is a blank circle. There remains a series of three figures not in depressed surfaces,—first, four spears or paddles arranged in a form suggestive of the letter M, a crescent, and under it two maees in the form of X, with two dots between the heads. Lastly, there is a circular figure around each end. One little flaw is seen in the edge of the depression from which the face is raised. The stone was so encrusted as to completely conceal all traces of the carving, and only a careful investigator would have discovered its secret. This was done by Seneca A. Ladd, the Meredith philosopher and antiquarian, in whose possession it now is. This stone has attracted the wonder of the scientific world, European sarans having vainly tried to obtain it. The Smithsonian Institution at Washington has offered to send a man to Meredith to make a cast of the "egg," as Mr. Ladd calls it.

Conclusion.—There is material enough of interesting matter relating to Meredith to fill a large volume, and it is not to be expected that into the space afforded by such a work as this all that is valuable could be compressed. We have given our attention more especially to preserving what we could of early days, knowing that the dust of oblivion would the sooner hide those events and characters forever from the view, and have, also, faithfully endeavored to condense as much of pure history as possible in these chapters, giving the formation of civil and religious organizations and their influence, development and results, however, quite fully, as they, by their combined action, have formed the character of the Meredith of to-day. The patriotism displayed by the town has fully justified the amount of space we have given to the military history. We trust that we have formed a nucleus around which some succeeding writer may crystallize all that is worthy of preservation relating to this ancient and honorable town.

Very Respectfully

Our thanks are due to all who have rendered assistance to the writer, and especially to W. O. Clough, whose investigations and prepared articles in the Meredith News have been of much service.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

GENERAL JOHN WADLEIGH.

It will be a step in the progress of a people's life when our memorials to the dead shall take the form, not of dull, senseless, decorative marble, but of a means of generating practical good, and inspiring life with nobler and loftier ideals. For every man who leaves behind him the expression of great thoughts, the record of noble deeds and a career of success in his particular field of labor helps to educate each successive generation. Such records of life, work and success supply the most inspiring and disinterested motives to the highest exertion in the present and in the future. In the various departments of business, in science and in letters, in law and theology, in politics and statesmanship, Belknap County has been honored by her sons, who, in their appropriate spheres, have exerted a deep influence, and the old town of Meredith has none whom her citizens justly hold in greater esteem and regard than General John Wadleigh, son of Dearborn and Polly (Hayes) Wadleigh. He was born in Meredith, N. H., June 3, 1806, and died October 25, 1873. He was a descendant of a family second to none in the State, whose members have ever been leaders in society and men of influence. Biography scientifically presents the ancestry of its subjects for brief and interested examination. Past generations are concerned in the building of the man, as well as the beloved mother. General Wadleigh's grandfather, John Wadleigh, was among the pioneers of the town, and the men of those early times were men of action. Energy was the corner-stone of their characters, the secret of their successful lives,—well-directed, steady, persistent energy. Mr. Wadleigh was a man of note, and his voice was often heard in the councils of the town, where he was many times chosen to office. In the great struggle of the American colonies with the mother-country he was an active participant, serving his country with patriotism and zeal. He died August 11, 1842, having nearly reached his four-score years and ten, leaving a name and character of inestimable worth. His wife, Mollie, died November 13, 1827, aged seventy years. Dearborn Wadleigh, their son, was born in Epping, N. H. He inherited the homestead farm in Meredith, which place had been his home from childhood, and married Polly Hayes, of Sanbornton, a woman whose rare merit was well known. It was said of her, "She was goodness itself." She died November 1, 1864, aged eighty-three. Dearborn Wadleigh was a man much esteemed in the community, and a valued citizen. He was positive, strong in his convictions, and in politics was an old-time Whig. He died December 27, 1859, at the age of eighty-two.

General Wadleigh remained with his parents on the old homestead until he was of age, participated in the labors of the field and received such education as the district school afforded, supplementing it at the old Gilmanton Academy, then in its palmy days. While yet a lad his heart was filled with the thoughts of the future and the ambition to be a leader among men, and his manly bearing and strong personality impressed itself upon those with whom he was brought in contact. The true American inheritance of free and independent thought had descended to him in more than ordinary measure, and he found his whole nature to be in direct opposition to the Federalistic principles of the Whig party, and, on reaching his majority, he affiliated with the Democrats, and cast his maiden vote for their candidate at election (town-meeting). On his return from the meeting he was informed that his presence at home was no longer desirable. The following morning, more in sorrow than anger, he left home, but with a brave spirit undaunted even by these circumstances. He went to Boston, where he established himself as a teacher of penmanship, in which art he excelled. His residence in Boston was not a permanent one. His father reconsidered his hasty decision, and earnestly entreated his son to return to his home; and to this request was added the urgent solicitations of the prominent Democrats, who assured him that they appreciated the value of a man who could so persistently stand by his political principles, even though his filial relations were sacrificed. After careful deliberation, and with a pardonable ambition to return to Meredith and justify the judgment of his political friends, he removed from Boston, and became a resident and citizen of the town of his birth, and tilled the ancestral acres. He was elected to many offices in the gift of his townsmen. He was presiding officer (moderator) of the town-meetings for several years. He was nominated for county treasurer of Strafford County in 1849, and at the election the nomination was indorsed by the voters, and he held this office at the time Belknap County was organized. He also served two years and a half as county treasurer of Belknap County, covering five terms of court, which were held semi-annually, in February and August. He was continuously in office, civil or military, from the age of twenty-one. He was commissioned justice of the peace and quorum throughout the State, and held the position for a quarter of a century, being first commissioned by Governor Isaac Hill, January 8, 1818, and receiving the last commission from Governor J. A. Gilmore, October 9, 1863. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1850. He represented Meredith several times in the General Court. In the years 1862 and 1863 he was a State Senator, and in all these civil offices his superior endowments were recognized.

But General Wadleigh's prominence as a public man was not confined to civil affairs; the military organizations claimed his attention in a large degree. He was pre-eminently a soldier. In manner and bearing, in energy and self-reliance, in the power to command and control men, in quick apprehension of circumstances and scrupulous attention to details, his mind was essentially military. His rapid promotion from ensign to major-general serves to show his remarkable ability. He was commissioned in the New Hampshire State militia as follows: Ensign by Governor David L. Morrill, April 18, 1827; lieutenant by Governor Benjamin Pierce, April 8, 1830; captain by Acting Governor Joseph M. Harper, April 29, 1831; adjutant by Governor Samuel Dinsmoor, April 15, 1833; colonel by Governor William Badger, July 1, 1834; brigadier-general by Governor Isaac Hill, September 4, 1837; major-general Second Division by Governor John Page, June 27, 1839. He was honorably discharged, at his own request, June 18, 1841. He was appointed adjutant and inspector-general of the New Hampshire militia by Governor Jared W. Williams, December 7, 1847, which office he retained until June 26, 1856. All the relations between General Wadleigh and his officers were characterized by the utmost cordiality, and his strictness of discipline did not detract from the friendship existing between them.

General Wadleigh married, in 1831, Mary Ann Wentworth, daughter of Bradley and Nancy Hannaford, of Meredith. They had four children,—Le Roy B., a resident of Clinton, Ia., a very able and successful business man, and who inherits many of his father's characteristics; Abbie (Mrs. Dr. G. F. Brickett), died July 31, 1864; John Dearborn, died November 10, 1871, married Annie, wife of Frank P. Leffingwell, an attorney of Chicago, Ill. Mrs. Wadleigh died December 31, 1866, aged fifty-six years, and, like her husband, enjoyed the warmest regards of the community.

General Wadleigh was a religious man and a prominent and active member of the Baptist Church. He possessed the fine feelings of the old-school gentleman, and was true as steel to his friends. He was a man of exemplary habits, kind-hearted, hospitable, generous to the needy, sympathetic with the suffering, diligent and faithful to all his trusts; as a citizen, he was a promoter of all movements tending to advance the interests of Meredith. Courage was a conspicuous quality of his nature. Inheriting a powerful physique, with immense impelling force, he had the self-poise and boldness imparted by the consciousness of strength. His latent resources, under the stimulus of difficulty and opposition, were always equal to the demands made upon him in meeting the weighty responsibilities and bearing the heavy burdens imposed. His moral courage, tried in many emergencies, was never found wanting. Neutrality was impossible to him, for he never shirked a duty or an issue. Holding pronounced opinions, he was always ready and able to defend them against any attack. His marvelous endurance was the wonder of his friends. His mind was a battery always charged, his animal spirits a fountain that never failed. Always sincere and honest himself and intensely loyal to his friends, hypocrisy or disloyalty to friendship was to him an unpardonable sin. He filled many high places of honor and responsibility. That he always discharged their duties with fidelity is shown by the oft-repeated and long-continued manifestations of public confidence and trust reposed in him. His services to the State were long and arduous. Such are the main points of the character, life and official career of General Wadleigh.

To those acquainted with the annals of New Hampshire his name is a familiar one, and in his native town no figure has been more prominent. In his character we find many of the crown jewels necessary to a successful life. Of rare judgment and irrepressible energy, he hewed to the line of unshaken purpose, and takes his place rightfully among those whose memory history will perpetuate. Everywhere, in every age, in every department of life, we find that success springs from the energy of the man,—that is, the ingredient of his nature without which life remains an unfulfilled promise,—and as there is an inspiration to others in the achievements of such men, we gather up this review of the life of General Wadleigh and lay it with honored record where its influence may descend with helpful strength to other men and other generations. His memory will long be cherished, and his life is a part of the history of the State.

SENECA A. LADD.

The first person bearing the name of Ladd in America, and doubtless the ancestor of all the families bearing the name in New Hampshire, was Daniel Ladd, who sailed from London with his wife, Ann, March 24, 1633, in the ship "Mary and John," and settled at Ipswich, Mass. His name is fifth on the list of sixty-eight who founded the town of Salisbury, in 1638. In 1649, with eleven others, he removed to Pawtucket, on the Merrimack, and organized the town of Haverhill, where he lived, respected and honored, to an advanced age. He was descended from an old Kentish family, who were landed proprietors as early as the fifteenth century.

Daniel Ladd, a lineal descendant from the English ancestor, was born August 21, 1742, at Epping, N. H., and became a farmer. He did not remain on the ancestral acres, but dealt largely in new land, residing first in Lee, then in Canterbury, and finally in London, where he was an early and esteemed citizen. He married Judith Lyford, of Raymond, about 1765. They had nine children, of whom the eighth was Gideon. Gideon was a chaise and carriage-builder. He was a man of much brain-power. Sober and sedate in his manners, of stern demeanor, he was a great admirer of the characters of the ancient Greeks and Romans, whose history he delighted to read. He was an industrious man and faithful to all his duties. A life-long resident of London, he died there February 2, 1848. He married Polly Osgood, of London, and had twelve children.

Seneca Augustus Ladd, fourth son and sixth child of Gideon and Polly (Osgood) Ladd, was born in London, N. H., April 29, 1819.

Probably no more marked individuality than his has been the production of the Granite State. From a child his methods of thought and execution have been sui generis. He attended the town school, summers, until ten years of age, and winters, until he was seventeen, without much progress, as he says: "School-books and rules were hard tasks for me, and to obtain knowledge in that way was much like trying to take on fat by eating saw-dust bread." Only one of his teachers comprehended his nature—John L. French, afterwards president of Pittsfield Bank. He allowed the youth to pursue his own methods, originate his own rules, choose his own time and way of study, only directing him in their general course. From him Seneca had the pleasure of receiving the prize offered to the class—a silver piece of Spanish money worth six and a quarter cents. Mr. Ladd still has the coin. When thirteen he went to learn the carriage-maker's trade in Raymond, and gave diligent service for four years, and, with his marked mechanical aptitude, was thoroughly prepared to do good work. He followed his trade in Meredith for two years, and then went to Boston and passed one year in constructing piano-fortes for Timothy Gilbert, in the second manufactory of the kind established in the United States. Returning to Meredith in July, 1839, he purchased mills and built a large carriage manufactory and entered into business on quite an extensive scale. This was something of an undertaking for a young man but twenty years of age; but Mr. Ladd, with his logical foresight, had mentally marked out the course he must pursue to win success. And it came. For eleven years he conducted his business with success. In April, 1850, his entire plant was destroyed by fire, with its valuable completed work. Mr. Ladd immediately leased the cotton-factory, then idle, and fitted it up with new machinery adapted to his purpose, and engaged in the manufacture of pianos and melodeons. He devoted himself to this for eighteen years in Meredith and Boston, and showed himself one of the most successful men of this line. He made money and was conceded to be master of all the elements of success in this field. Having acquired a sufficient property to place him above the necessity of an incessant devotion to business, and having attained all the mental development he could expect in the various branches of labor he had followed, he was ready for a change and further progress. His humanitarian and philanthropic nature guided him in this. As an employer he had noted the recklessness with which the young people squandered their wages, apparently not knowing how to save their money, and his advice had frequently been given to them to take care of it. In revolving the problem of how to help them, the idea of a savings-bank seemed the thing needed. In November, 1869, he and his associates procured a charter from the Legislature and established the Meredith Village Savings-Bank (see History). The good accomplished by Mr. Ladd's zealous and persevering efforts in founding this bank has been very great, and will only be appreciated at its full value when looked upon by those of coming time; for it is a fact that never is a man fully understood or his real worth comprehended by his contemporaries.

Such a peculiar nature as Mr. Ladd's must needs have had a peculiar education. This has been given by careful observation of everything that came in his way; by examining the structure and nature of the smallest as well as largest matters in nature; by attending to the needs of each of the many sides of both mental and physical organisms; by practical business, by newspapers, scientific and literary works of a high order, and by avoiding everything tending to sensation or frivolity. He has never read a novel or attended a theatre. This education has given him a mental character of strength and ability far beyond that attained by the usual curriculum of a college course, and on any of the grave subjects under discussion among scholars his opinion is listened to with earnestness and commands respect. From an early day he has been pronounced in his adherence to temperance. When a boy he joined a church, but left it as soon as he found that it was obligatory on him to take wine at communion. Since then he has been a member of no church, but contributed to the support of many. He has never used tobacco or alcohol in any form, and has battled strongly against the rum traffic. In politics, his votes have always been cast in favor of universal freedom. The Liberty, Abolition and Republican parties have, in turn, received his warmest support and most active services, and in all social and public matters he has ever been in accord with the most advanced and progressive minds.

His regard for the young has been noticeable through life. He rarely passes children without bowing or speaking to them, and during his life he continually scattered kind deeds among them. William O. Clough, editor of the Nashua Telegraph, expresses the result of this in his own case, and this is but one out of many of like character: "Mr. Ladd was always giving me something, doing me some favor, speaking kind words to me, encouraging me, giving me to understand that my chances in the world were just as good as anybody's, providing I kept at school and did right. Somehow I always felt, while I lived in the neighborhood, that he was watching me, that I had a friend in him, and for these reasons I tried to be a good boy and meet his approbation. I hold Mr. Ladd in grateful remembrance, and never think of him but to honor him, or hear his name mentioned but to recall instantly his generosity towards me; and I thank him for all the favors shown me in my youth, for all the kind words spoken and good advice given."

Mr. Ladd married, first, Susan Tilton, of Meredith, March 21, 1849. She was a most estimable and Christian lady, and at her death, August 14, 1850, the whole community was wrapped in gloom. Their children were Fannie C. A. (Mrs. D. W. Coe) and Charles F. A. (deceased). He married, second, Catherine S., daughter of William Wallace, Esq., of Henniker, June 1, 1852. They have one child, Virginia B.

Mr. Ladd is an earnest student of geological and meteorological science. He has kept meteorological records for eighteen years. He has devoted much time to the study of geology, mineralogy and nature, and has acquired one of the finest private collections of minerals, antiquities and Indian relics in New Hampshire. Notwithstanding his p penchant for science, he is a thorough New Englander in practicality and enjoys himself in constant occupation.

Rev. I. F. Holton, an eminent scientist and a strong personal friend, gives, in the Boston Daily News, this graphic picture of Mr. Ladd and the bank: "This gentleman of boundless courtesy and leisure is very hard of hearing, a man of great reflection, remarkable observation and unusual originality. The establishment looks like a professor's cabinet; there are no signs of a bank, external or internal. Cases of books, minerals, coins, gems and antiquities, a few pictures, a 'Novelty' printing-press, a moderate safe and a lounge or two, with easy-chairs, complete the establishment. Clay-stones and other concretions and results of frost have been an especial study, and also stone arrow-heads of both the Old World and the New. Several specimens are of flint and probably came from Europe." (For the description of the stone "egg," the gem of his collection, see "History of Meredith.")

Mr. Ladd, through partial loss of hearing, has been compelled to labor in a more circumscribed field than otherwise would have been the case; but the same fixed integrity, persevering diligence and mental qualities which have in so conspicuous a manner won success in the unassuming vocation to which he has given his attention could have wrought only the same successful result in a broader sphere. He is an honorary member of the New Hampshire Antiquarian Society, resident member of the New Hampshire Historical Society, member of the Pilgrim Society of Plymouth, Mass., and life-member of the New Hampshire Home and School of Industry. Many of his pithy sayings and expressions are worthy of being preserved as comparing well with those given by Franklin in "Poor Richard's Sayings." They have a dry, pleasing, Yankee terseness which goes at once to the essence of the subject. We regret we have space for but few,—

"Life-possessors, the world over, are artists. Mind, however high or low, is the canvas. All labor is merely the placing of colors and tints. The picture exhibits nature improved by art. Life was not created for life's sake, but as a means of perfecting nature, and thus form the basis of perfect bliss, the apparent aim of all sensible beings." "The active youth, having a good physique, who shuns idle labor, will build up a beautiful and perfect body, a wise and powerful mind, and among men will be as a towering pyramid among chafing pebbles." "It is common for some persons to go back to rectify mistakes, and for others to go forward after duty; both are in error, as there cannot be any duty back or forward of the present."

Most kind and attentive in his family relations, liberal in all matters of public improvement, no man in Meredith has stronger friends. Confucius, in his five classes of men, describes one as "philosophers." "They are they who, in their words, their actions and in the general conduct of their lives, never depart from the line of strict rectitude; who do right because it is right; whose passions are subdued; who are always the same in adversity and prosperity; who speak when they ought to speak, and are silent when they ought to be silent; having firmness enough not to conceal their sentiments when it is proper to utter them, although they should lose thereby their fortunes or their lives; who despise no one, nor prefer themselves to others; who are not content to derive their knowledge from ordinary sources, but push their investigations to the fountain-head, so as to free their knowledge from all mixture of error; not discouraged when they fail, nor proud when they succeed."

In placing Mr. Ladd in this class we will receive the approval of those who understand him best.

SAMUEL HODGSON.

It is a pleasure to the historian to turn aside from the narration of events to chronicle the record of a self-made, industrious and useful person, who, by his own ability and honest dealing, has placed himself high on the list of business men, as having achieved a justly-merited success. And of such a man we write when we write of Samuel, or "Sam" Hodgson, as he is familiarly called.

Samuel Hodgson was born January 19, 1842, in Halifax, Yorkshire, England. He comes of a family of respectability, his parents, Ellis and Sarah (Lassey) Hodgson, being in comfortable financial circumstances. His school-education was acquired before he was fourteen years old at the boarding-school of

Sam. Hodson

Mythobroyd and Farrar's Academy at Halifax. His great-uncle, George Wilcock, manufacturer of cotton yarns and warps, needing a clerk, Sam took the place and rapidly developed a practical knowledge of both manufacturing and financial departments. He remained here eight years, having full charge the last four, conducting the business successfully. His father afterward established him in manufacturing for himself, but he was so hampered by conditions, which gave him little opportunity to carry out his own ideas, that he gave up the concern to his father and, in 1866, crossed the ocean to America. Here he arrived with a strong and healthy physique and a determination to conquer all obstacles. His eyes were turned naturally to the manufacturing town of Lowell, and his first employment was found in the dye-house of one of the large corporations there. The quick observation of Mr. Hodgson, his determination to do his work well and his obvious attention to the interests of his employers gained him the hearty friendship and confidence of the agent and superintendent, and was the foundation of his successful business career. One of these gentlemen, Mr. Appleyard, in a few months went to Lake village to establish a dye-house, there being a demand for one at that place. He soon had an opportunity to secure Mr. Hodgson's services and gladly accepted them, giving him at the same time an interest in the business. Before policies had been issued on their application for insurance to cover their own property and goods left there to be colored, a fire destroyed the entire plant, with the exception of a few chemicals hurriedly drawn from the burning building. The little capital economy had acquired for Mr. Hodgson was thus swept away, but the firm of Appleyard & Hodgson was soon at work in a new building on the same spot. Mr. Appleyard soon formed another business connection at Ashland, and the dye-house was left in Mr. Hodgson's control. Taking personal charge of the practical part of the business and exposing himself in the wet dyeing-room, thus depriving himself of needed rest and sleep, a rheumatic fever seized him, and with such strength that his recovery was considered impossible by his physicians. His robust health heretofore, the careful nursing of kind friends and an invincible will wrought a cure, however, and in the intervals of delirium he gave directions to an unskilled workman, which enabled the business to go on its regular course. The dye-house was conducted to the satisfaction of his patrons and with profit for four or five years; but as the mills in Laconia and Lake village for which he did business began to add, gradually, dyeing to their own establishments, the demand arose for something to take the place of the waning industry, and Mr. Hodgson, in 1870, began the manufacture of cotton and merino hosiery. In 1872 the cotton hosiery business was in a very unsatisfactory condition, and by a falling market Mr. Hodgson lost nearly all his accumulated capital, which necessitated the temporary closing of his works. During this year (1872) Wm. H. Abel, an ingenious mechanic, came to Lake village and, at Mr. Hodgson's suggestion, began to experiment on the construction of an automatic loom which should take the place of the old style hand-loom for knitting stockings; for Mr. Hodgson was convinced that before this manufacture could become largely profitable an improvement in the machinery used would have to be made. While at work on this, Mr. Abel invented a machine for knitting mittens, with which, in 1874, Mr. Hodgson began the manufacture of mittens on contract, with good success. In 1876 he removed to Meredith village, leased the power and mills of the Mechanics' Association and continued manufacturing mittens until 1877. By this time Mr. Abel had perfected and patented his automatic machine for knitting stockings, which made a full-fashioned stocking that possessed great advantages over the common sewing-machine work. This wonderful invention, doing by machinery that which before had to be done by hand, entirely revolutionized the manufacture of knit goods, furnished a new industry to the country and gave an impetus to this branch of business, which added largely to the wealth of, and built up rapidly, Laconia, Lake village, etc. In 1877, Mr. Hodgson began manufacturing stockings with the new machines, putting them in as fast as possible and to the full capacity of his power. Since coming to Meredith he has erected new buildings, trebled the floor-room and capacity of the mills, and has been largely engaged in the manufacture of his specialties, woolen hosiery and knit mittens, and is to-day the principal motor of activity in the village and town. He employs from one hundred and fifty to one hundred and sixty operatives, the greater number of whom are women and natives of the vicinity. Mr. Hodgson, believing that good wages secure good workmen, acts on his belief, and this industry has added much to the prosperity of Meredith. A visit to these mills shows one secret of his success. Absolute purity is required in every article; even so simple a thing as the soap used is manufactured here, and the exact strength of each dye is known, so an exact result can be exactly predicated. All material is of the best of its kind, the machinery, made under special patents, some of them being entirely the property of Mr. Hodgson, is of the latest improved designs and almost automatic in the perfection of its workmanship. The mill is fully ventilated; perfect cleanliness is observable in every department. Mr. Hodgson has a keen eye to read human nature, and calls into his service the best adapted persons. His superintendent, W. H. Hurst, an intelligent gentleman, formerly a practical knit-goods manufacturer of England, is thoroughly at home in the mill, and, with an experienced overseer, carries on the daily programme of labor so well that Mr. Hodgson knows in his absence that all is going on properly. The mill is protected from fire by good force pumps, with hydrants in each room.

Mr. Hodgson is now a naturalized American, and cast his first vote last fall for President, and is as fully devoted to the welfare and prosperity of this country, and as fully in accord with American manners and customs, as if he were a born New Englander, and with characteristic good judgment has taken one of the daughters of New Hampshire for a wife, Elizabeth A. Dow, of Ashland. She has been and is truly a help-meat, and now superintends the finishing department of the mill. Her practical common sense, industry and frugality have been important factors in his success.

A kind, social and agreeable companion, a public-spirited citizen of unostentation and without presumption, it goes without saying that Mr. Hodgson is immensely popular, not only among his workmen and in Meredith, but throughout a wide range of acquaintance. He is a member of the New Hampshire Club, of the Amoskeag Veterans, and has taken the various Masonic degrees to Knight Templar.

Looking forward to some period of retirement from manufacturing, Mr. Hodgson is at work on a farm of two hundred acres with the same system and "push" that characterize all his undertakings, and although rapidly putting this place into permanent improvement by a force which seems large to the old-fashioned farmer, yet his expenditures would be considered in Boston only a fair salary for a confidential clerk or a "super" of a first-class manufactory, and the work is done in accordance with true business principles, and is an investment which will pay.

Mr. Hodgson's success should be an incentive to every young man who, like himself, has brains, energy and a capacity to carry ideas into practical working. He has been successful because he deserves to be, and enjoys the friendship and esteem of the leading men of this section. A citizen of sterling integrity, kind and generous impulses, and frank and manly bearing, there is not one who does not heartily wish him a long continuance of the prosperity which has in no wise changed his genial and cordial nature.

JOSEPH W. LANG.

None of the present generation of Meredith has been more identified with every phase of its business for the last half century, or has to-day a higher place in the esteem and love of the people of the town, than the honored and venerable Joseph W. Lang. He was born June 21, 1798, at Portsmouth, N. H., and is descended from early settlers of Rockingham County. His grandfather, Josiah Lang, born in Greenland, N. H., had three brothers, one of whom lived in North Hampton, one in Concord, and one in Sanbornton. His parents were Josiah and Sarah (Whidden) Lang, and they had those frugal and honest virtues for which the New Englander of that day was noted. Josiah was a farmer with but limited capital, and to provide a more efficient home he moved to Tuftonborough, when lands were cheap, and purchased six hundred acres of land. He was a quiet, pleasant man, whom every one liked. His wife was one of those industrious Christian mothers whose influence was for good upon her children. They had three children, Joseph W., Thomas E., and Josiah, who died young. The loss of this, her youngest son, affected Mrs. Lang's sensitive nature, and she never fully recovered from the blow. In later life they removed to Meredith, where Mr. Lang died, in 1857, aged eighty-three. Mrs. Lang survived him three years, dying in 1860, aged eighty-seven. Both were mourned by many friends.

Joseph W. Lang was, from very early years, accustomed to labor, and grew to the age of seventeen amid the healthful country air and pleasant rural life of his father's farm. At this age he had a conference with his father concerning their financial condition. The conclusion was this: there was then due on the farm six hundred dollars, that could never be paid by labor on it, and the only way to extinguish the debt was to get money from outside; so it was decided that Joseph should go from home to earn what he could for that purpose. He went to Portsmouth. Wages were at that time eight dollars per month; but the young man deemed his services worth at least ten, and soon obtained employment as a peddler. Knowing his mother would scarcely approve the associations he would be subjected to, he at once wrote her not to be worried, as he would drink no spirits until he had seen her. He kept his word, not only by keeping his promise, but drinking nothing that would intoxicate while in the business, and has always held to strong temperance principles. Working eight months the first year, without losing a day or drawing a dollar, he returned home with eighty dollars in his pocket. Eleven weeks of the ensuing winter were passed in "Master" Leavitt's school in Meredith, from which he graduated. He peddled three years, cleared the debt from the home farm, and developed those qualities of business acumen and thrift which have accompanied him through life. Adding one hundred more acres to the home farm, he taught school for three years, both winter and summer terms, and boarded at home. The pay contrasts strongly with the present wages of teachers, ten dollars a month being considered ample remuneration for superintending the researches of a hundred (more or less) boys and girls in the mysteries of reading, writing, arithmetic and the rudiments of grammar. The board was from one dollar to one dollar and a quarter a week. Mr. Lang was a successful teacher, and much loved by his pupils.

Mr. Lang had now fully decided to become a settled farmer, and had about fifty acres of the home farm set off to him, on which he erected a substantial house and barn, and married, June 20, 1824, Mchitable Clark Young, daughter of Benjamin Young, Esq., and her counsel and assistance were very helpful to the young agriculturist. But the farmers of Tufonborough were not long to claim, among their number, such a promising recruit. Mr. Joseph Smith, of Dover, was the chief business man of the Lake County,—an extensive merchant, who had stores at these places: Farmington, Alton Bay, Meredith, Wolfborough, Centre Harbor and Moultonborough. In 1826, wishing an honest and reliable clerk, his attention was attracted to Mr. Lang. Mr. Crosby, one of his employes, went to Tufonborough and offered the young farmer a salary of two hundred and fifty dollars and the use of a house for the first year.

Joseph W. Seung

Upon due consideration, the offer was accepted, and Mr. Lang was placed in charge of the Wolfborough store. Remaining here about two and one-half years, he succeeded Mr. Crosby in the charge of the store at Meredith, and held that position until the failure of Mr. Smith, in 1830, when Mr. Lang was induced to take the Meredith business as his own, which he did, assuming the liabilities, which amounted to six thousand dollars, and from that time until 1869, when he retired,—a period of about forty years,—he was in active business, alone and with various partners, being the principal merchant of the town. He was also connected with every enterprise tending to the improvement and the furthering of industries in Meredith. Prior to 1835, Mr. Lang, together with Captain Daniel Smith, Mr. Daventry, Mr. Woodman and Abel Phillbrick, purchased a grist-mill, two stories in height, fitted it up as a cotton-factory, and formed the Meredith Village Cotton-Factory Company, and carried on business for a few years. He was the first agent and one of the incorporators of the Belknap Steamboat Company, which built the first steamboat in the State, "The Belknap," at Lake village, and was the only member of the company from this section. He was one of the first stockholders of the Belknap, Concord and Meredith Railroad, and for nineteen years a director, closing his connection with the road, as such, on reaching his eightieth year. He, with Joseph Ela, Colonel Stevens, F. Smith and others, purchased the mills and privileges at Meredith village and formed the Mechanics' Association, with a capital of thirty thousand dollars, and was its first treasurer, which position he held several years. He was one of the incorporators of the Meredith Village Savings Bank, and president from its organization.

In February, 1863, Mrs. Lang died, and November 8, 1866, Mr. Lang married Mrs. Julia A. Taylor, daughter of Captain John B. and Comfort (Sanborn) Perkins, of Sanbornton, a lady with whom his declining years are passing most happily. [Captain Perkins, her father, lived to be ninety-six years old, retaining his remarkable memory to the last, and his clear understanding of occurrences and men of the past was of inestimable service to Rev. Mr. Rannels in preparing his history of Sanbornton.]

In all of the public affairs of the town, Mr. Lang has been closely allied, and he has been often called to offices of trust and honor by his townsmen. He was town treasurer for six, and moderator for many years. Politically, he has been Whig and Republican, and, in the State Legislature of 1856-57, he represented Meredith. A faithful and active member of the Congregational Church, giving freely and liberally to its support, and living a life based on the precepts of the "Golden Rule," Mr. Lang feels and acts as if the competency which he has acquired by his constant and unremitting industry is only intrusted to his care for the good of others. Goodness and benevolence are stamped upon his face, and, on every side, through all the years of his life, his kind acts have been continuously, quietly and most ostentatiously done, he scarcely letting his "left hand know what his right hand did."

"And wisest he in this whole, wide land
Of hoarding till he's out and gray;
For all you can hold in your old, dead hand
Is what you have given away."

In the fullness of years, honored by the confidence and love of the better part of the community, Mr. Lang can have the satisfaction of knowing that he has worthily and honorably passed a useful and laborious career, and that his memory will be a sweet remembrance in the hearts of a large circle of friends.

COLONEL EBENEZER STEVENS.

Among the leading business men whose activity, enterprise and persistent industry have been powerful motors in furthering the growth and developing the physical and moral interests of Meredith must be mentioned Ebenezer Stevens. He comes from sturdy ancestry, his great-grandfather, Major Ebenezer Stevens, being one of the early settlers of Kingston, N. H. He was a brave man and gallant soldier, and received his title from services rendered in the French and Indian War. Major Stevens married, December 5, 1710, Elisabeth Colcord and had four sons. He died November 1, 1749. He was a very distinguished and useful citizen, and such was his integrity and benevolence that differences among the people were submitted to him with perfect confidence in a just decision. He sustained many important functions and discharged every duty with ability and faithfulness and left the beneficial impress of his strong character upon the community where he lived for many years.

The second son of Major Stevens was Colonel Ebenezer, born June 10, 1715; married, first, 1736, Mary Colcord; second, 1768, Dolly Stevens, of Newburyport. His children were Ebenezer, Jr., born in 1739, a deacon of the church in Kingston; John, born in 1770; Moses, born in 1771; Peter C., born in 1773; Paul, born in 1775.

A romantic instance of Colonel Ebenezer Stevens' early life is given in our history of "Rockingham and Strafford Counties, N. H.,"

"When seven years of age, he, with others, was taken captive by the Indians, and carried through Lake Winnepesaukee to Canada. Here he remained for one year, when he was ransomed by his father paying 100 silver pistareens ($17). It is said that they demanded a higher price because he wore a better hat and better clothing than his companions."

He received a common-school education and became a farmer and successful business man, owning much real estate. He was for many years proprietors' clerk and also transacted important business for the State, and Stevenstown (now Salisbury) was named for him. He died July 19, 1800, when nearly ninety years old.

Colonel Stevens was a very polite gentleman of the old school, and it is related of him, that, on riding on horseback from meeting, he would carry his cocked hat under his arm, a distance of two miles, bowing to the people on the way. He took the father of Daniel Webster, as a boy of nine, to "bring up," and promised that he should learn a trade. But, conceiving a liking for the boy, he kept him on his farm until he was twenty-one and then started him in life by giving him a farm in Andover. Years passed; Colonel Stevens began to succumb to the infirmities of age, and both mental and physical powers were weakened, when Mr. Webster, taking advantage of his condition, insisted that more remuneration was due him as damages for not being taught a trade, and the colonel gave him the farm in Salisbury where Daniel Webster was born.

Paul Stevens, the youngest son of Colonel Ebenezer and Dolly Stevens, was born in Kingston in 1775 and received the usual education and did the work of farmers' boys of that day. He learned the shoemaker's trade and was also a farmer, his father's property enabling all the children to own some land; but his share was a small farm in New Chester, worth about six hundred dollars. Here he settled, about 1796, with his wife Sally, daughter of Dr. Howe, an eminent surgeon in the American army of the Revolution, who was disowned by his family for his rebel affiliations. His father was Lord Viscount Howe, at one time Governor of Barbadoes, and his mother, Mary Sophia Charlotte, daughter of Baron Kilmanseige, Master of the Horse to George I., when Elector of Hanover, by a daughter of Count Platen, of the empire. Lady Howe was afterward created Countess of Darlington by George I. This worthy couple had four sons,—George A. (killed in the French and Indian War in America), Richard (Lord Admiral Howe, commander of the British naval forces of the American Revolution); William (General Sir William Howe, who commanded the British army during the same war) and Surgeon Howe (the father of Mrs. Stevens).

The money Dr. Howe received for his army service, some three or four thousand dollars, became valueless by the great depreciation of the Continental currency.

Paul Stevens and his wife remained in New Chester for a few years, and there four of his children—Dolly William, Mark and Sarah—were born. Purchasing a better farm, he removed to New Hampton, which was the birth-place of his two daughters,—Fanny and Nancy. Four or five years passed, and Mr. Stevens moved to Gilford, near Gilmanton, and purchased one hundred and fifty acres of rough, unbroken land, which, after many years of hard, unremitting labor, was transformed into a well-cultivated farm. He passed the remainder of his life in Gilford, dying in August, 1846, aged seventy-one years. The rest of his children—Fifield, Peter F., Ebenezer, Moses, John, Paul, James S. and two who died in infancy—were born in Gilford.

Paul Stevens was an intelligent, unassuming, quiet man, of deeply religious principles, much respected in the communities where he resided. Mrs. Stevens was a noble, fine-looking woman, of great strength of character and religious feeling, and taught her children Christianity by example, as well as by word. Mr. and Mrs. Stevens were among the first adherents of the new belief of the Free-Will Baptist Church, of which they were members. She survived her husband several years and died in Gilford.

Colonel Ebenezer Stevens, son of Paul and Sally (Howe) Stevens, was born May 9, 1810, and when but seven years old was compelled to commence the battle of life. He first went to live with a farmer whose home was back of the Belknap Mountains, in what was called "The Cellar." In a year he changed his abode, but until he was fourteen his occupation was "tilling the soil." He then learned blacksmithing of his brother William, and worked with him for some time. Earning some money, he attended school and boarded with Dr. Crosby and wife. The Christian kindness and sympathy of this worthy couple won the young man's heart, and enabled them to use a strong and beneficial influence upon him, which is appreciated even yet, and causes him to hold their memory in reverential honor. Before he was seventeen he purchased an old shop in Gilford village, on credit, and, borrowing fifty dollars as a capital, he established himself as a blacksmith. Early in the morning and late at night the fire glowed on his hearth, and the sound of his hammer was heard. He was prospered, as the diligent and industrious always are. The first year he cleared three hundred and twenty-five dollars. Having proved his ability to support himself, and being well established in business, Mr. Stevens married, January 15, 1831, Therina daughter of John S. and Leah (Prescott) Osgood, and granddaughter of Colonel Prescott, of Gilmanton. They had three children,—Cyrus A., Celestia A. (married Edward Stowell, resides in North Adams, and has two children) and Ebenezer (who died when four years of age). Mrs. Stevens died January 17, 1845, aged thirty-three years.

In 1837, Mr. Stevens removed to Meredith village and carried on blacksmithing until 1845, doing a large business. About 1850 he engaged in merchandising with Joseph W. Lang. This partnership continued pleasantly and profitably for six years, and after this Mr. Stevens was in trade alone and with various partners for twenty years.

He married, April 22, 1846, Cassandra, daughter of John B. and Alice (Ladd) Swasey, of Meredith, and had one child—Alice S. (married Henry W. Lincoln, of Norton, Mass.; they have three children). [Mrs. Stevens is a descendant of two early New Hampshire families of repute, her father being third in descent from Ebenezer Swasey, of Exeter, whose son Benjamin, born at Exeter October 16, 1752, married Jane Bond, February 15, 1777, and moved to Meredith, where John B. was born April 3, 1782. He settled in Meredith village, became a prominent business man, having a large mercantile trade, and extensively owning real estate. He erected large mills on the water privilege owned previously by Daniel Avery, and in numerous ways served the town as postmaster, etc., and was a pillar of society. He died March 11, 1828. His wife, Alice Ladd, was a descendant in the sixth degree from Daniel Ladd (see biography of Seneca Ladd), the line being Daniel (1), Samuel (2), John (3), Timothy (4), Eliphalet (5) (born February 19, 1755, married Mary Park, of Windham, May 13, 1778), Alice (6). Mrs. Alice (Ladd) Swasey died February 6, 1875, aged ninety-six years. She had lived in Meredith over sixty-five years, and in houses located on the same site. She was a lady of intellect, and her love of reading and appreciation of good literature continued through life. Her memory was very retentive, and, her mental faculties being unimpaired, she wrote a poem when she was ninety years old, which had all the freshness of one written by one not half her age. She ever possessed a great love of the beautiful in art, literature and nature. Mrs. Stevens inherits many of the characteristics of her mother, and is a most intelligent and interesting lady, whom it is a pleasure to meet.]

From about the age of seventeen Mr. Stevens took an interest in militia matters, and was rapidly promoted through the various grades to that of colonel, and held the offices of brigade and division inspector for many years. In 1845 he was elected selectman and served three years, and conducted several important lawsuits for the town to a successful issue. Since then he has been largely identified with town and public matters. He has held the commission of justice of the peace for over forty years. He was representative in 1854 and 1855. An old Whig, he became an active Republican, and was Presidential elector for Lincoln in 1860. He was selectman of Meredith during the Rebellion, and was energetic in the discharge of the onerous duties which devolved upon him in that capacity. He assisted in the disbursement of thousands of dollars; was offered the colonelcy of the Twelfth Regiment, which, through his efforts and others, was raised in five days; he prepared the list of soldiers sent by Meredith, published elsewhere in this history, and during the war period received the nomination of his (the minority) party, and carried its full vote for the important positions of State Senator, councilor, etc. Before 1850 he began to do probate business; this has grown largely, and a great portion of his time since has been occupied in settling estates, attending to guardianships to which he has been appointed, and he has done more of this class of business, probably, than any other person in the county. Being careful, prudent and kind-hearted, he is peculiarly fitted for the guardianship of the poor and unfortunate.

He has been prominently connected with the Free-Will Baptist Church since 1840; has been trustee of New Hampton Seminary, where, for seventeen years consecutively, he was marshal on anniversary occasions.

He was one of the incorporators, and has served as president and treasurer, of the Meredith Mechanic Association; one of the incorporators and trustees of the Meredith Village Savings-Bank; one of the directors of the Belknap County Bank, Laconia, and is also trustee of Laconia Savings-Bank.

We can in no better manner sum up the character of Colonel Stevens than to repeat the words used by the historian of Kingston in describing his great-grandfather, Major Ebenezer: "He sustained many important functions, and discharged every duty with ability and faithfulness." Of untiring energy and persistent perseverance, he is a "self-made" man in the highest sense of the word.

JOSEPH ELA.

Joseph Ela, son of John Whitcher (Whittier) Ela and his wife, Mchitable Dame, was born in Lee, N. H., July 29, 1797.

The Ela family has been, for many years, a reputable one in England. The name of the first American progenitor of this line is, doubtless, Daniel Ela, with whom the town of Haverhill, Mass., voted to exchange certain lands on October 19, 1658. From this time the name occurs frequently in Haverhill, Daniel being often elected to offices of trust. He was chosen moderator in 1699 and town attorney in 1700. He was an inn-keeper in 1677 and possessed quite a property for those times.

Israel Ela, probably his son, was made freeman of Haverhill in 1677, and his descendants for many years occupied the lands granted to Daniel. He married Abigail Bosworth, and died March 29, 1700. He had two sons and three daughters. John Ela, second son of Israel, born in Haverhill June 15, 1683, married Rachel Page, had five children and died in 1742, aged fifty-nine. Their oldest child,

Jacob, born February 1, 1711-12, was twice married. By his second wife, Mrs. Ednah (Little) Gale, he had eight children, the oldest being John. (His sixth child, Lydia, married Daniel Appleton, and numbered among her descendants the celebrated family of that name in New York City.)

John Ela was born in Haverhill, Mass., January 6, 1749-51. He was a farmer and noted for his great size. He weighed four hundred pounds. All his children were by his first wife, Ruth Whittier. He died at the age of forty-six years. The oldest were twins, Nathaniel W. and John Whittier, born February 5, 1766. Nathaniel became a citizen of Dover, where, for over fifty years, he conducted a most popular hotel and made a large range of acquaintance. He was a very genial person, a hatter by trade, which he carried on for some years. John W. became a farmer in Durham, Lee and Barnstead, N. H., married Mehitable Dame, of Durham, January 7, 1793, and had three children,—Ednah, Joseph, John. He died June 15, 1891, when Joseph was but four years old. Receiving the care of a faithful mother until he was nearly fifteen years old, Joseph went to Dover to learn the hatter's trade of his Uncle Nathaniel. The confinement proved injurious to the young man, and he had two attacks of fever, in which he nearly lost his life; but he finished his trade, and, when of age, in company with another young man, he established himself as a hatter in Norway Plains (Rochester). His health again failing, he changed his business and became a merchant's clerk for two years, in which he was so popular as to make many friends and attract the attention of leading merchants.

The long and unusually active business connection of Mr. Ela with Meredith and its vicinity, and his residence in this town, date from July 2, 1822, when he came to take charge of the Meredith store of Joseph Smith, of Dover, the great merchant of the lake. For four years Mr. Ela gave his unintermitting and untiring attention to the onerous duties of this position, until the sedentary life again impairing his health, he found he must change his business to one giving more exercise in the open air. For six months he was a teamster. Receiving the appointment of deputy-sheriff, in 1828, for the county of Strafford, and shortly after being deputized to act in Grafton County, he soon found his hands full of legal business. Everything in those days was sold on credit, and none were refused. When the merchants were tired of waiting for their pay, which came in all kinds of barter, money being almost an unknown quantity, the debtor was sued and the officers of the law were set at work. An execution against the body of any debtor who owed thirteen dollars could be taken out, if no property could be found, and the unfortunate man sent to the county jail at Dover. Many of these trips were taken by Mr. Ela, who was active, vigorous and resolute in discharging his official duties, tempering them, however, with as much mercy as his position would allow. For over thirty years he continued in this official capacity in Strafford and Grafton until the organization of Belknap County, then in Belknap, Carroll and Grafton; and probably no other officer in any of these counties ever transacted as much business, served as many writs or rode so many miles as Mr. Ela. For twenty years he was the "crier" of the courts of Strafford County, and served in the same office in Belknap County as long as he was in active service, which continued until 1858 or 1859. His long continuance in office is the strongest evidence possible of his capabilities, his honesty, his devotion to duty, and, also, of his popularity as a man.

In 1846, Mr. Ela was employed by the Lake Company to purchase the right of flowage on Lake Winnepesaukee, and, in doing this, was compelled to buy many pieces of land beyond the flowage line. In settling with the company Mr. Ela received this land, and in this manner acquired much land along Plymouth Street, in Meredith village, as well as elsewhere. The possession of this real estate led him into building houses upon it, and he has built and owned fifty-two different houses in the village.

In 1858 he suggested the importance of forming a corporation to buy and control the water-power at Meredith village, and from his suggestion and active interest the Mechanics' Association was organized. (See history.)

Mr. Ela was also one of the incorporators and first trustees of the Meredith Village Savings-Bank, and has been, during all the years of his residence here, connected with, and an earnest supporter of, all things tending to improve, benefit or advance the better interests of Meredith. He married, in 1832, Sally Miller Moulton, daughter of Jonathan Moulton, a prominent manufacturer of his day in Meredith. She died May 21, 1878, in her sixty-fifth year. This worthy couple had five children who attained maturity,—Laura E. (married, first, Daniel S. Belee, whose surviving daughter, Nellie, is now the widow of James W. Horn, and, second, Alvin Peavey); John W., educated at Cambridge Law School, became a lawyer in Plymouth, went out in the Civil War of 1861 as captain of a company in Fifteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, honorably discharged at expiration of term of service, he established himself as a lawyer in Chicago, Ill., where he now enjoys a fine practice; Charles H., deceased; Ednah, married George E. Gilman, now lives in Detroit and has three children; Lucella C., died aged seventeen years.

Mr. Ela has ever been a pronounced Democrat of the Jefferson and Jackson school, believing their doctrines to be the only guide to a successful continuance of the republic, and he has strongly battled for the success of those principles. He was appointed postmaster in 1822 and held the office three years. He has been selectman six or eight terms, town agent and special agent in numbers of cases, represented Meredith in the State Legislature of 1871-72, and has been frequently requested to accept his party nomination for Senator and other offices, which were declined. At the time of the construction of the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad he took several large contracts, which were faithfully performed. His sight was destroyed by cataract in 1872.

For over sixty years has Mr. Ela been one of the leading men of this town, and to-day, with clear mind, he can look back over the whole of that time and tell the course, progress and development of any movement which has occurred, and analyze clearly the reason of its growth or failure.

Successful in business, happy in his family relations, blest with the kind care of loving descendants and with a large circle of friends who honor and esteem him for his many good qualities, Mr. Ela is a venerated member of society, one of the few remaining pensioners of the War of 1812.

SIMEON D. PEASE.

The Pease family was among the early settlers of Meredith and is well worthy of record in this place. By reference to the ecclesiastical history of this town, we see the great influence its members had in the religious matters and progress of this section, and, in all ways, they have been connected with the well-doing and honorable element of its citizens.

Joseph Pease was born March 10, 1774, and was one of the good, old-fashioned men of the last century. He was kind-hearted, full of activity and blunt earnestness, and delighted in nothing better than in a run after the foxes, of which he was a noted hunter. The children had cause to love him for his kindness. Before mounting his horse to ride from his house to the village he would fill his capacious pockets with apples to throw to them. Often, when shaking hands with a poor man, he would leave a silver dollar. Quaint, impulsive, humorous and eccentric withal, fixed in his Democratic faith, he was a thoroughly good man and took great pride in his well-tilled and remunerative farm. His brother Simeon was a deacon for many years in the Free-Will Baptist Church and possessed a deeply religious nature. They were of a family of eleven children of Benjamin and Anna (Sanborn) Pease, who established their home on Oak Hill among the first settlers, and, by hard work, economy and steady battling with obstacles little understood in these days, carved out a home and secured a competency for their children. Benjamin was born August 2, 1743, and died February 26, 1802, leaving the record of a life usefully spent. Joseph married, April 11, 1796, Hannah Folsom. They had ten children.

Simeon D. Pease, son of Joseph and Hannah (Folsom) Pease, was born at Oak Hill, Meredith, July 7, 1812, and died January 21, 1885. He married Betsey, daughter of Nathaniel and Patience (Page) Batchelder. Their children are (1) Arzelia Jane, married Edwin Cox, express agent in Meredith village; they have one child, named Clarence. (2) Laura E. (3) Mary R., married Howard Prescott, and lives in Chicago, Ill. (4) Hannah A., married Frank Cummings; resides in Holderness; they have one child, Hannah I. (5) Frank B., married Clara Hoyt, and is a member of the mercantile house of Pease & Towle, in Meredith village; they have one child, Betsey Bertha. (6) Simeon Loring, married Ellen Hanson, and is a farmer on the old homestead. Simeon, as before mentioned, was born in the early part of the nineteenth century, and, environed by the narrowing circumstances of that period, his education was necessarily limited to the common schools of his native town. Devoting himself to agriculture, he threw himself with all the energy of his nature into the cultivation and improvement of the ancestral acres, succeeding his father in their care and became known as one of the best farmers of the town. Industrious and frugal, he added to his inherited property. He was a life-long Democrat and believed, with Jefferson, that "a strict adherence to the Constitution was the one thing needful to the perpetuity of the Union, and that any departure from its spirit and teachings would result in harm to our country," and during all the years of his manhood he battled strongly for his principles.

Mr. Pease was an industrious, social man, possessed of sound judgment and good common sense, which were appreciated by his townsmen, who often asked and heeded his counsel in affairs requiring firmness and deliberation. He was often chosen to positions of public trust, served as selectman, and was several times elected representative to the General Court, and many times selected to do other business of private as well as public character. He enjoyed the esteem of the community for his many sterling qualities.

Mrs. Pease, who survives her husband, is a descendant of the Rev. Stephen Batchelder, a prominent minister, who was born in England in 1561, and emigrated to America in 1632, and settled first in Lynn, Mass., and afterwards, 1638, removed to Hampton and exerted a great influence for many years. He returned to England, where he died, having lived nearly a century. Abraham Batchelder was born August 13, 1750, and married Nabby —, who was born in 1752 and died July 11, 1802. Their son Nathaniel was born in Northwood, N. H., May 16, 1786, and married Patience Page. Their daughter, Mrs. Pease, inherits many of the strong traits of her ancestors.

JAMES GILMAN.

One hundred years ago Exeter was, as it is to-day, the abode of many families of ancient and honorable descent. They were people of means, education and their patriotism was undoubted. Through all the colonial period they were a notable and influential race, and there have been men among their descendants, in every generation, who have done honor to their country. The Gilmans came to New Hampshire soon after their first settlement, and, in 1679, Hon. John Gilman was one of the councilors named in President Cutts' commission. Captain Nicholas Gilman was an officer of skill in the Indian wars of Queen Anne's reign. Hon. Peter Gilman was the first to bear the title of brigadier-general in New Hampshire. Colonel Daniel Gilman was a grantee of the town of Gilmanston.

The American ancestor of the Meredith branch of the family was Moses, who came from Hingham, England, and settled at Exeter. The line to the present generation is Moses (1), James (2), Timothy (3), James (4), David (5), James (6).

James Gilman (6), son of David and Sally (Clark) Gilman, and grandson of James and Deborah (Goodhue) Gilman, was born in Meredith December 31, 1813. His grandfather, James (4), was born in New Market, N. H., May 30, 1750 (O. S.). He was a tiller of the soil, and resided in his native town, working industriously, until he was forty years of age, when, with his wife and six children,—James, Samuel, Uriah, Deborah, David and Josiah,—he came to Meredith, in 1790, when it was comparatively a young town, and settled on the lot where his grandson, James (6), now lives. At the time of the Revolution he served a few months at Portsmouth. He was a Democrat, one of the old-fashioned men of fixed principles, good judgment and few words, and those words were held as law by his children, who respected and loved him. He was a hard-working, diligent farmer, brave and patient in accomplishing whatever his hands found to do, and for forty-eight years he lived and labored on the farm in Meredith. He died September 12, 1838, when nearly four-score years and ten, having served his day and generation well. His wife was of the Goodhue family, and a member of the Baptist Church. She died July 4, 1815. David (5), fourth son of James (4), was born in New Market, May 9, 1785. He married, October 22, 1812, Sally, daughter of Moses Clark, of Sanbornton. They had three children,—James (6), Martha and David. July 1, 1817, less than five years after his marriage, David Gilman died, and his father, although past the prime of life, gave a home to his grandchildren and their mother. David Gilman was a Democrat in politics. He, with his wife, were active members of the Baptist Church.

James Gilman (6) was the oldest of the three children, and early in life he made a brave and honest struggle with the difficulties of his lot. He became a farmer on the old homestead, receiving his education at the common schools of the town, and now resides in the same house that his grandfather built in 1790. In 1836 he was surveyor of highways, and out of twenty-eight names on the list there is now but one person besides himself living. The same year, February 24th, he married Susan, daughter of William and Eunice (Roberts) Mead, who was born August 20, 1810.

[Mrs. Gilman is a descendant from two old and respected families in Meredith. Her grandfather, William Mead, was one of the first settlers of the town, and was chosen moderator of the first town meeting. He was a man of good judgment, and one whose counsel was of great value to the pioneers. He had a large family,—seven girls and four boys. His son William married Eunice (born in 1789), daughter of Lieutenant Roberts, whose name often appears on committees to serve for wise and grave purposes. William Mead (2) was always a farmer and lived where his grandson, Joseph, now resides, on Meredith Neck. He was an upright, honest man, and took great pride in his farm and stock, and by his care and labor acquired property and the reputation of being an excellent farmer. He married twice, and had an old-fashioned New England family of fifteen children,—Eunice, Joseph, William and John, Joshua, Benjamin, Daniel, Polly, Abigail, Susan and her twin, Stephen, Smith, Stephen and Sarah.]

The children of James (6) and Susan (Mead) Gilman were as follows: (1) Granville B., born April 16, 1837; married Carrie Fletcher; resides in San Francisco, Cal. (2) Martha Jane, born September 16, 1839. (3) James Marshall, born June 9, 1842; married Mattie Smith; they reside in California and have six children,—Marshall F., Herbert M., Carrie A. James G., Arthur F. and one other. (4) Mary Susan, born December 7, 1843. (5) David Frank, born May 15, 1846. (6) Sarah Frances, born September 6, 1849; died April 13, 1850. (7) Ellen (Lill), born March 29, 1851; married Fred. S. Prescott; they have three children,—Leo F., Harry S. and Frank G. (8) Fanny M., who died aged two years and nine months.

James Gilman possesses unwearying industry, and through many long years he has been a worker, a producer and not a mere consumer. Early in life he learned the full import of the words, "Thou shalt earn thy bread by the sweat of thy brow." For twenty-four years he diligently worked eighteen hours a day. He holds the old-school principles, such doctrines as were established and current in the period of his manhood, for men rarely change their views and habits after they pass middle life. Socially, he is plain and unpretending, has an active, keen, inquiring mind and a clear and retentive memory. He is a good conversationalist, and gives accurate and graphic descriptions of the times and manners of the people of his earlier years. Politically, Mr. Gilman has ever remained true to those old Democratic ideas of Jefferson and Jackson, and has been wise enough not to be a lover of party political offices. Religiously, he holds to the Bible, and rests his hopes on it, and has been a consistent member of the Baptist Church for nearly half a century. Mr. Gilman has been through life a strong, representative man of the town, held in high esteem by its best citizens, and has the pleasant satisfaction of knowing that his children are occupying useful and honorable positions, doing credit to the good name of the family.

 GEORGE GILMAN FOGG.

George Gilman Fogg was born at Meredith Centre, N. H., May 26, 1813, and died at Concord, N. H., October 5, 1881. He was the son of David and Hannah Gilman (Vickery) Fogg. His father was a native of Pittsfield, and his mother of Exeter. He was fitted for college at the New Hampton Institution and graduated at Dartmouth College in the class of 1839. He studied law with Judge Lovell, at Meredith, and at the Harvard Law School, and commenced the practice of his profession at Gilmanton Iron-Works in 1842.

In 1846 he was a member of the House of Representatives and took an active part in the election of John P. Hale as Senator. Up to this time a Democrat, he now became a prominent member of the Free-Soil party, as it was then constituted, so far as they were not affected by the question of slavery. During this session he was elected Secretary of State, holding the office for one year. This necessitated his removal to Concord, which was thenceforward his home.

Mr. Fogg was, practically, the founder of the Independent Democrat, a newspaper which exerted a great influence upon New Hampshire politics. It was started in Manchester May 1, 1845, but removed to Concord in June following. Mr. Fogg did not nominally assume control till February, 1846, but he contributed to its columns from the first. From this time until 1861 this newspaper absorbed the best energies of his life. In 1856 he made a trip to Kansas as clerk of the Kansas Commission of the United States House of Representatives. He was law reporter of New Hampshire from 1855 to 1859. He was a delegate from New Hampshire to the convention which nominated Abraham Lincoln in 1860, and secretary of the Republican National Executive Committee in the campaign which followed. After the Republican party obtained control of the State he was, also, for several years, State printer, that position, according to custom, being always given to prominent editors. In 1861 he was appointed by President Lincoln minister for the United States to Switzerland, holding the office until after the assassination of the President, in 1865. After his return from Europe he was appointed, in 1867, United States Senator by Governor Smyth, to fill the unexpired term of Hon. Daniel Clark, who had been appointed judge of the United States District Court for New Hampshire.

He resumed editorial labor in 1867 (though not, as before, taking sole charge of the paper), finally severing his official connection in 1872. From this time to his death he only wrote occasional articles for the press.

Mr. Fogg was a member of the New Hampshire Historical Society, succeeding Rev. Dr. Bouton as corresponding secretary, trustee of Bates College, Maine, receiving from that institution the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. He was stricken with paralysis September 11, 1879, from which he only partially recovered, and which finally culminated in his death.

Mr. Fogg was never married. He left legacies to Dartmouth College, the school at New Hampton, the Unitarian Church in Concord, with which he was connected, the school district where he was born, and to various charitable institutions in Concord, in addition to legacies to his kindred and friends. He had previously made a liberal gift to Bates College.

HISTORY OF NEW HAMPTON.

CHAPTER I.

Geographical—Original Grant—Incorporation of Town—Various Petitions—Documentary History—Congregational Church—New Hampton Academy

THE town of New Hampton lies in the northern part of the county, and is bounded as follows:

Northeast, by Centre Harbor; Southeast, by McRedith; North and Northwest, by Grafton County; Southwest, by Merrimack County.

The territory was granted to General Jonathan Moulton and others, proprietors of Moultonborough, January 24, 1765, and was called Moultonborough Addition. It was incorporated as a town November 27, 1777, and received its present name at that time at the request of General Moulton, in honor of his native town.

By an act passed December 7, 1797, the northeast part of the town was set off and incorporated as a town by the name of Centre Harbor, which name was given in consequence of its containing within its bounds the centre one of the three principal harbors on the north side of the lake, said harbor having borne that name for some years prior to the incorporation of the town.

In 1784 the following persons petitioned the Governor and Council for the appointment of Benjamin Moulton as a justice of the peace:

The following is the vote of the town relative to setting off the northeast part, 1796:

"At a publick Town meeting Holden in New Hampton the Sixth Day of March, A. D. 1796, voted that the N. E. part of New Hampton be set off as far as Mensley pond, thence to Mensly pond Brook, thence up the middle of 89 Brook to Long pond, thence up the middle of long pond to the Inlet at the Head of 89 pond, thence N. thirty-five Degrees W. to New Holderness—

The territory named was set off and became a portion of Centre Harbor December 7, 1797.

The following is a soldier's order:

"NEWHAMPTON, August 29, 1792.

"To the Treasurer of the State of New Hampshire:

"Sir, Please to Pay to John Nicholl or his order what Ever is due to me, I, John Smith, having been a Soldier in the 1st N. Hampshire Regt, if being for value Received.

Congregational Church.—The first reference on the town records to ecclesiastical affairs is under date of March 20, 1800, when it was voted "to settle Mr. Hebard as a gospel minister;" years, 73; says, 45. At the same meeting it was voted to choose a committee of nine men to make arrangements for his settlement. At an adjourned meeting in May following, the committee reported that if Salmon Hebard be settled as minister, he shall have one hundred acres of land off the northwesterly end of the minister lot (so called), exclusive of six acres to be round about the meeting-house for the accommodation of said town as common and burying-ground. He was also to have fifty acres more as "compensation to him as a settlement for the erected buildings, etc." It was agreed that the new minister should have one hundred and fifty dollars per year, and it was also agreed that he should have two or three Sabbaths a year to visit his friends.

Rev. Salmon Hebard was ordained June 25, 1800. In 1801 the church had one hundred and thirty-five members. After a number of years the membership began to decrease, and in about the year 1820 meetings were discontinued. In 1833 it consisted of twelve members.

October 7, 1842, the church met at the residence of Rufus G. Lewis, the following being present: Rufus

G. Lewis, A. B. Sanborn, Noah Mason and Timothy Merrick, of the New Hampton Church; and Rev. Daniel O. Morton and Chester Stone, of Bristol. At this meeting the church was formally dissolved. The records of the church closed with a list of nineteen members who had received letters of recommendation to the church in Bristol, May 4, 1842, and of one other member to the same church, May 6, 1843.

A literary institution, called the New Hampton Academy, established here, was incorporated June 27, 1821. The management of the institution was placed in the hands of three trustees, and so continued until 1826. In June of that year the name of the institution was changed by law to "The Academic and Theological Institution in New Hampton," and the number of trustees increased to eleven, five of whom were to be appointed by the proprietors and five by the Baptist Convention. The principal of the school was also to be one of the trustees. By an act of the Legislature, approved July 6, 1849, the control of the academy passed into the hands of the Baptist Convention, which was empowered to appoint all of the eleven trustees. This institution was removed to Vermont about 1852.

NEW HAMPTON INSTITUTION.

THE history of the New Hampton Institution naturally divides itself into three periods, the boundaries of which are sharply defined.

The beginning of the first period is set forth in the following characteristic announcement:

"NEW HAMPTON ACADEMY.

"The public are informed that the first term of this Seminary for the instruction of young gentlemen and ladies, will commence on Monday, the 17th day of September next, at the new and elegant building on the town common, within six rods of the meeting-house.

"Mr. George Richardson, who graduated at Dartmouth College at the last commencement, and is now Preceptor of Moore's School, at Hanover, is engaged as Preceptor. Said Richardson is highly recommended by Prof. Adams, of Dartmouth College, as a man of good moral character and respectable literary acquirements, and has given general satisfaction as a public teacher.

"Tuition, $3.00 per quarter. Board, from $1.00 to $1.18 per week.

"New Hampton, July 19, 1821.

"NATHAN NORRIS, } Acad. Academy"

It is a matter of surprise, in the retrospect, how there ever happened to be a New Hampton Institution, and how it so early acquired and has so long maintained its widely-extended reputation. "The new and elegant building" was only a two-story frame building, twenty-four by thirty-two, and at the opening of the first term had but one room ready for occupation. Without libraries, philosophical apparatus or even black-boards, it was furnished with plain, unpainted seats and desks of pine, like the district school-house of thirty years ago, and was heated from an open fire place. The little building stood on the town common in a country with such a sparse population that scarce a dozen buildings of any kind could be found within a radius of half a mile, and was surrounded by a community who quite generally entertained the notion that education spoiled people for work, and that learning was an aristocratic luxury; and yet with all these drawbacks, the New Hampton Institution has been, from the first, remarkably successful, having had a much wider patronage than has been usual in schools of a similar grade, and having maintained an exceptionally good reputation during its whole history.

The original movement for the erection of an academy building grew out of a combination of circumstances. There was at the time an unusual interest in educational matters manifested in different parts of the State. The journals of the Legislature show that academies were springing up on every side, and to locate an academy in a community was regarded as a popular thing to do, and as a probable source of material prosperity. John K. Simpson, Esq., a native of the town and a successful Boston merchant, did much to intensify this feeling. Keenly alive to the interests of his native town, and with little sympathy for the prejudice against education then entertained by Free-Will Baptists, with whom he was connected, he was an early, if not the foremost, leader in the enterprise. At Quarterly Meetings and elsewhere he spoke earnestly upon the subject, and undoubtedly promised a liberal contribution from his own purse. What other causes conspired to bring about the result we may not know, but the fact remains that on the 17th day of September, 1821, the door of the academy was opened, and since that time, with the exception of a few months, a school has been regularly maintained.

At first the academy was little in advance of the common school. Few, if any, of the students had mastered more than the rudiments of an English education. Fully one-third of the fifty or sixty who sat in Preceptor Richardson's school-room were Boston lads, who, to come here, had to submit to the hardship of a two-days' journey by stage-coach, and to exchange the comforts of their city homes for the rough fare of poor country farmers.

There were four terms of twelve weeks each. All the students remained in the school-room for six hours daily, and the green-hide was the last resort in enforcing discipline. Mr. Richardson remained until 1825, when he was succeeded by Bezabed Smith, who was recently an orthodox minister in West Hartford, Vt.

It was during this year (1825) that the first important change in the management of the school occurred. At that time the Baptist denomination was without an academy in New England. Mr. Simpson, who, after removing to Boston, had become connected with the Baptists, proposed that the proposition be made to the Baptists of New Hampshire to take the school under their patronage. The trustees, having learned by experience the difficulties attending the maintenance of a school dependent so largely upon local patronage, were quite ready to receive assistance from abroad. Mr. Simpson, with a prophetic shrewdness little less than wonderful, stated that "the Free-Will Baptists are not prepared to enter this enterprise now, but they will be in about twenty-five years"—a prophecy whose literal fulfillment came only twenty-seven years later. Accordingly, the proposition was made that the Baptists assume control of the school, "with the right to appoint one-half of the trustees, besides the Principal, who should be a Baptist and President of the Board." At a Baptist State Convention this proposition was accepted and Rev. B. F. Farnsworth, then editor of the Christian Watchmen, was chosen principal.

The school, by virtue of an amended charter, now became known as "The New Hampton Academical and Theological Institution," and at once commenced a vigorous growth. The patronage of the Baptists immediately secured a large attendance of students from every New England State, besides occasional representations from New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and the Canadas. The slender accommodations were soon filled to overflowing, and new buildings became necessary. In 1826 a new building, for recitations, was added, and in 1829 a large brick block of three stories was erected for dormitories.

During the same year (1829) the people at the "Village," aroused to action by the success attending the school at the "Centre," erected a school building and opened what soon became known as the "Female Department." Previous to this time the attendance had been largely confined to males, but afterwards the two sexes were quite equally divided. Under the care of Professor Farnsworth and of Rev. E. B. Smith, D.D., who succeeded him as principal in 1832, the school rapidly improved in the extent and thoroughness of its course of study, and was annually attended by more than three hundred different students. The female department, under the care of Miss Martha Hazeltine and of Miss Sarah Sleeper, who followed her as principal in 1839, justly held an advanced position among the female seminaries of that day. It is not too much to say that these ladies did here what their contemporaries, Miss Lyon and Miss Banister, were doing at Mount Holyoke. They impressed all the pupils with whom they came in contact with their own earnest, self-sacrificing spirit, and awakened in them a high opinion of the mission and dignity of true womanhood. They made their department a place of thorough and faithful instruction, and of earnest, painstaking study. As a result, many of their pupils became missionaries, and not less than one hundred of them became successful teachers in female seminaries.

In 1829 a Theological Department was opened, which, for twenty-three years, had an annual average attendance of twenty-five.

The three literary societies—the "Literary Adelpi," founded in 1827, the "Social Fraternity," in 1830, and the "Ladies' Literary and Missionary Association," in 1833—added largely to the interest felt in the school, and, by means of their libraries, reading-rooms and weekly meetings, afforded an ample field for valuable discipline and public display, of which their members were always ready to avail themselves.

The death of its first patron, Mr. Simpson, in 1837, and the financial disturbances of that year, put an end to the liberal plans that were entertained for the future enlargement of the school.

From 1837 to 1852 there seems to have been but little change. The attendance of pupils averaged over three hundred annually, and teachers were not wanting to maintain the credit of the Institution. But financial embarrassments, for a long time a source of difficulty, at last compelled the trustees to consent to the removal of the school to Fairfax, Vt.

It has been estimated that during this period not less than seven thousand five hundred different students were connected with the Institution.

But the departure of the Baptists was not to close the New Hampton School history; it merely opened the way for the fulfillment of Mr. Simpson's prediction. The Free-Will Baptists were now ready for the enterprise. Defeated in several attempts to maintain unendowed schools, the generous offers that came from New Hampton aroused them to make another effort, and a variety of events conspired to make the movement successful. Here was a small community which had grown up around the academy, all of whose associations and business plans hinged, more or less, upon the culture, life and material activity to which the school gave rise; here were ample school buildings which, to devote to mechanic arts, seemed a profanation, while to allow them to fall down in ruins was a sight not to be endured; here still remained the prestige of the name "New Hampton," which would be a power in a thousand New England homes; here was, very nearly, the numerical and geographical centre of the Free-Will Baptist denomination; here were the libraries of the two societies who, after a somewhat bitter canvass, had decided by a decisive vote to remain in New Hampton, and here was the man, Colonel R. G. Lewis, with brain quick to conceive, with liberal heart, and hands prompt to do, who felt the burden of a mission to give a title of the means a kind Providence had given him, for the benefit of those among whom he lived. What could be more natural than a proposition to the Free-Will Baptists to come in and occupy the abandoned ground, and a prompt acceptance of the proposition by them?

A new charter, with the name of the "New Hampton Literary and Biblical Institution," was approved January 5, 1853, and the corporation organized twenty days after. The charter contains the names of the following gentlemen: Ebenezer Fisk, Levi Carter, Rufus G. Lewis, Henry Y. Simpson, Russell Cox, Dana Woodman, Thomas Perkins, Benjamin Magoon, David B. Plummer, Benjamin J. Cole, Smith Swain, Daniel Smith and William Moore.

It was voted that all the departments should be located at the "Village." The old school buildings were purchased at once and the work of removing those at the "Centre" commenced. The library belonging to the ladies' literary society, the cabinets of curiosities, the philosophical apparatus and the chapel bell were removed to Fairfax. The remainder of the school property passed into the hands of the new corporation by purchase.

The Female Department was opened in the "Old Seminary" in April, 1853, with Mrs. C. P. Stanton as principal, assisted by four lady teachers, with fifty-seven students in attendance. Three weeks later, the Male Department was reopened in what is now Commercial Hall, formerly the "Chapel" at the "Centre," with Professor Benjamin Stanton principal and Rev. I. D. Stewart assistant. Mr. A. P. Shattuck was teacher of penmanship in both departments. There were forty-one students present.

The school rapidly increased in numbers, and the average aggregate attendance for the next five years was seven hundred and thirty-five annually.

In 1853 the old "Brick" at the "Centre" was taken down and the materials used in the erection of "Randall Hall," and a wooden building of two stories, immediately in the rear of it, was added for a boarding-house. About the same time the building known as the "Lodge" was opened for a female boarding-house. In 1858 the trustees purchased the building formerly owned by Miss Sleeper, and now known as the "Centre House." The old village church, which for some years had been used as a chapel, was taken down in 1859, and the materials employed in the erection of "Chapel Hall." During the same year the "Old Seminary" ceased to be used and was soon after removed.

In 1854 the Biblical School was transferred to New Hampton from Whitestown, N. Y. This department, under the instruction of Rev. J. J. Butler, D.D., and Rev. J. Fullonton, D.D., occupied a portion of the Institution buildings, but was entirely distinct from the other departments of the school, being under the control of the Free-Will Baptist Education Society. It was afterwards, in 1879, removed to Lewiston, Me., having had an average annual attendance of about twenty.

The aggregate attendance in all the departments of the Institution since its reorganization has been about six hundred annually.

The school is located in New Hampton village, near the geographical centre of the State, and is accessible daily from almost every part of New England. It is seven miles from Ashland Station, on the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad; five miles from Bristol Station, on the Northern Railroad, and thirteen miles from Center Harbor, on the Winnepesaukee.

The air, water and drainage are good; the scenery is beautiful; the climate is healthful. There was one period of twelve successive years in which there was not a single death of any student connected with the Institution. The buildings are pleasantly situated, and their internal arrangements are neat and commodious. Chapel Hall has a brick front fifty feet in length, three stories high, with a wing extending in the rear seventy feet, two stories high. This building is used for a chapel, recitation-rooms, laboratories, cabinet, library, etc. It contains sixteen, large, well-ventilated rooms. Randall Hall is a brick building one hundred feet long and three stories high. The whole of the upper floor is occupied by the Commercial College. The remainder of the building is used for libraries and dormitories for gentlemen students.

In the Ladies' Department it is the aim to combine the influence of family life with the literary advantages of the Institution. Instead of one large dormitory, the young ladies are accommodated in several smaller ones, thus enabling students to mingle more freely with each other and with their teachers.

There are six buildings belonging to the Institution, the value of which is estimated by the trustees at about thirty thousand dollars.

There are six courses of study,—the English and classical, the classical, the English, the scientific, the musical and the Commercial College course. All these are open to both sexes, and those who complete them are entitled to receive diplomas. The classical course is unsurpassed in thoroughness. The course in Latin and Greek includes the usual amount required for admission to college. Derivation, synonyms and the systematic analysis of words receive careful attention. French and German are taught by a lady who has spent several years in France and Germany. The natural sciences are taught according to the most approved methods, and the most important truths are illustrated by the use of apparatus. There is a good cabinet of minerals and fossils. The course in mathematics consists of four terms in arithmetic, four in algebra, two in geometry and one in surveying. In the Commercial College are taught penmanship, commercial law, single and double-entry book-keeping, commission, joint-commission, freight and express business, political economy and banking. The course is systematic, thorough and practical.

The college bank is organized each term with a cash capital of four hundred thousand dollars, in which the books are kept and business is transacted as in legal national banks.

The merchandise emporium is a wholesale establishment with an inventory of merchandise amounting to more than two hundred thousand dollars, where the books are kept according to the most approved methods for the jobbing business. The price of merchandise is regulated by a varying standard, allowing ample opportunity for the exercise of financial ability.

There are six telegraph-offices in the rear of the hall, furnished with first-class apparatus. Telegraphy is taught wholly by sound.

Special attention is given to music, drawing, painting and elocution.

Connected with the Institution are four libraries, containing about four thousand volumes of well-selected books, to all of which students have access free of charge.

As a large proportion of the students who have been connected with the Institution have been compelled to support themselves by their own exertions, it has been the constant aim of the trustees to furnish the best facilities for obtaining an education with the least possible expense.

Hence, the expenses of students have been less than at any other school of similar grade in the State.

The school is organized on the modern plan of most similar institutions, with two departments embracing both sexes under the same general government and instruction. A board of thirty-six trustees, two-thirds of whom must be members of Free-Will Baptist Churches, exercise a general control and supervision of the affairs of the Institution; but the practical management, for the most part, devolves upon the executive committee, consisting of five members, usually residents of New Hampton.

The government of the students is entrusted to the faculty, consisting of the salaried teachers. The discipline is mild, but firm and decided. There are ten teachers connected with the Institution,—four females and six males.

From the reorganization of the school in 1853 to 1868 there were frequent changes in the faculty. During those fifteen years there were eight different principals, but the present principal has had charge of the school during the last seventeen years.

The Institution has an endowment of about ten thousand dollars, which ought to be largely increased. It is hoped that the alumni will see that the school is properly and speedily endowed.

The trustees consider that the school is in as good a state, and is as worthy of patronage, as it has ever been, and it will be their constant endeavor to advance with the progressive spirit of the age.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

REV. A. B. MESERVEY.

Rev. Atwood Bond Meservey, son of William and Elvina (Bond) Meservey, was born at Appleton, Me.,

September 30, 1831. His father was a farmer and a member of the Baptist Church, and all the religious influences of Christian home-life were thrown around the early years of the children. After receiving the education given at district schools and several terms at High Schools and academies, Mr. Meservey made choice of medicine as his profession, and attended lectures in the school-year of 1852-53 at Bowdoin College. He, however, was actively engaged in religious exercises, having joined the Free-Will Baptist Church at South Montville, Me., in 1850, and, after long and earnest consideration, he decided to become a clergyman, and, in 1855, came to New Hampton to prepare for college. He was graduated from the literary department in 1857, and then passed three years here in the study of theology, supplementing this by six months' attendance at Andover (Mass.) Theological Seminary, afterwards, in 1862, attending lectures on physical geography and geology at Brown University. He may be justly called a self-educated man, as he earned the necessary money to defray his expenses while studying by teaching and preaching. In 1861 he was ordained pastor of the Free-Will Baptist Church at Meredith village. In the fall of 1862 he became convinced that a most useful field of Christian labor was presented to him in educational work, and commenced his long and valuable connection with New Hampton Institution, as professor of mathematics and natural sciences, and, from that time, he has been identified with the educational interests of the State. He went to Northwood, in 1867, as the principal of the seminary, and after a year's service in that capacity he returned to New Hampton and became principal of the school.

Mr. Meservey has shown himself to be unusually well fitted for the labors devolving upon him of maintaining a high standard of scholarship among the students, of impressing a spirit of integrity, purity and elevated purpose upon their minds, coupled with an energy and thoroughness which would insure valuable practical results; and under his guidance and unremitting exertions the school has taken a high rank. He has given himself without reservation to this end, and with his characteristic zeal has sown lavishly the seed which has brought forth as bountiful fruit. As an instructor he has made simplicity and thoroughness the prime objects of his attention, and with an enthusiasm that was conveyed to his pupils, he carried them over all obstacles, making himself at the same time at once their instructor, counselor and friend. The graduates of the "Institution" under his management are scattered over the whole land, and recall with pleasure the days of their sojourn at New Hampton, and the friendly and inspiring memories of school and principal. Many of them are filling responsible positions of honor and trust, doing credit to themselves and to their teachers, and gratefully confess their indebtedness for the stations they are occupying to the kind and faithful perseverance, fatherly sympathy and religious care of Professor Meservey.

The school has been conducted under great disadvantages. No rich endowment fund has given its wealth to lighten the care of management, and it has been a struggle, always continuing and never ending, to bring about the desired result of yearly advancing its efficiency and strength; but Professor Meservey has the satisfaction of knowing that each successive graduation day has added to the reputation of the school and to the solidity of its foundation. The "business college" is conceded to be the best in the State, while every department is doing excellent labor.

He has been an educator in other ways,—in the pulpit, on the lecture platform, and last, not least, as an author. A serial contributed to the Congregationalist, and since published in book-form by D. Lothrop & Co., under the title of "Through Struggle to Victory," is an earnest plea for aid to needy students preparing for the Christian ministry. In 1875 he published "Meservey's Book-Keeping," which has met with favor, being now in use in over five hundred schools in various towns and cities of New England, and in over ninety academies and seminaries. He has just issued from the press "First Lessons in Political Economy." These works present the simplicity, earnestness and directness so characteristic of the author.

Mr. Meservey received the degree of A.M. from Brown University, and that of Ph.D. from Bates College. Republican in politics, he represented New Hampton in the State Legislature in 1867.

Mr. Meservey married, first, in 1861, Miss Lizzie Bean, of Candia (they had one child, Lizzie); second, in 1869, Miss Louanna Sherburne Mead, of Northwood; (their only child, John Edwin, died in infancy); third, in 1883, Miss Clara Bell Fall, of Great Falls (she was the valued lady principal of the "Institution" for three years; they have one child, Arthur Bond).

HISTORY OF TILTON

BY J. J. DEARBORN, M.D.

CHAPTER I.

ON the 28th of October, 1748, a petition containing sixty names was addressed to His Majesty, King George the Second, asking for a tract of land in this vicinity. Before granted, it was found that the land desired came within the Masonian claim. These sixty petitioners then addressed the Masonian proprietors for the tract of land, which they granted, with the proviso that they (the grantors) should name twenty other grantees. The petitioners accepted their proposal, and the land was granted on the 31st of December, 1748. It was substantially the same ground covered in the act of incorporation of Sanbornton, March 1, 1770.

It is a singular fact, but nevertheless true, that the first settlement of Sanbornton occurred within the present town of Tilton. From Rev. M. T. Runnels' "History of Sanbornton" (vol. i, p. 44) we obtain the following information: That the first settlement was on the farm now occupied by Andrew Phillbrick, just above East Tilton, on the Laconia road; that the town was settled in 1765-66 by John Sanborn, David Dustin, Andrew Rowen and others. It is equally certain that Daniel Fifield and Samuel Shepard moved to the town in 1764; the three first settlers being Moses Danforth, who settled near Little Bay, Andrew Rowen, at East Tilton, and Solomon Copp, they coming here early in the spring of 1764.

The first frame house in town was erected by Sergeant John Sanborn in 1765, some three-fourths of a mile north of Tilton village, on land now owned by F. A. Morgan, on the road leading from the village to Sanbornton Square. The first settlement at Tin Corner was made in 1764-65. The first store within the bounds of Tilton was built by a Mr. Duncan, from Concord, as early as 1789. It stood on the corner now occupied by the town hall.

The first permanent saw-mill within the present town was known as the old Morrison or Darling privilege, it being the first west of the present railroad station, and was built previous to January 5, 1775; and there must have been a grist-mill in connection with the saw-mill as early as 1766.

In the granting of most of the townships in this State by Massachusetts, or the Masonian proprietors, a territory equal to six miles square, and frequently larger, was granted to actual settlers under conditions named in their charters. As their population increased, the towns became incorporated under State laws. The residents were economical, thrifty and energetic; their land gave abundant crops, and, for a time, they were content; but, as their children reached maturity, population and wealth increased, they became possessed with the idea that the old town contained too much territory. The business had changed from where, in times past, it had developed, one portion of the town having grown with greater rapidity than the rest, and soon the effort was made to incorporate a new town. In many instances a new town was made from two or more older towns; while in other instances a new town was incorporated from the original township.

Formation of the Town of Tilton.—The first action taken in regard to the formation of the town of Tilton was a petition presented to the General Court in 1850. In 1860 two special town-meetings were held in the old town of Sanbornton, to act on the division of the town, but nothing came from it. A special town-meeting was held May 18, 1869, to act on an article relative to the division of the town, one hundred and fifty voting to dismiss the article and one hundred and five voting in its favor. The men at the helm were energetic, courageous and determined on the formation of a new town, and this proved the final and decisive action. Sanbornton appointed Herman T. Hale as agent, authorizing him to employ such counsel as was necessary to oppose the division of the town.

As first proposed, it was intended to make the division on the fourth range line, with a southern detour at the east end, thereby giving Mosquito bridge to Sanbornton; but by the act approved June 30, 1869, third range line was adopted, with a northern detour, thereby assigning the bridge to this town.

ACT OF INCORPORATION.

"AN ACT to constitute the Town of Tilton from a Part of the Territory of the Town of Sanbornton.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court Concurred:

"Section 1. That all that part of Sanbornton lying within the following lines and boundaries, to wit: Beginning at the centre of the Winnepesaukee River, at the southwest corner of said Sanbornton, on the line of the town of Franklin, thence northerly, on the line between said Frank-in and said Sanbornton, to the north side of the third range of lots in said Sanbornton; thence easterly, on the north side of said range line, to the highway leading from Union Bridge to Lacoma, across the Ray Bridge; thence on the north line of said highway to the Sanbornton town line, on the north side of said Ray Bridge; thence on said Sanbornton town line, down the Winnepesaukee River to the place of beginning,—he, and the same hereby is, severed from the Town of Sanbornton and made a body politic and corporate by the name of Tilton.

"Section 2. All real and personal property, including all debts, claims and demands of every kind now owned by and due to the town of Sanbornton, all school and other funds belonging to said town, and the proportion of the literary fund, which, until a new apportionment of State taxes, shall be payable to said towns, shall be divided between them in the proportion of $4.50 to Sanbornton and $5.50 to Tilton. And if said towns cannot agree upon the division of any such property, the County Commissioners for the County of Belknap, for the time being, upon the request of either town, may make division of the same, or assign the same, or any part thereof, to either of said towns, and may order the town to which such property may be assigned, to pay over such sums of money to the other town as in their opinion is equitable, according to the foregoing proportion, and may fix the time of payment.

"Section 3. All taxes assessed since March last upon the polls and estate of persons residing in said town of Tilton, as hereby constituted, and all non-resident taxes assessed since March last in said town, shall be collected by the collector, to whom the same has been committed for that purpose; and after deducting therefrom the State and county taxes, shall be by him paid over to said town of Tilton, in the same manner in which he is directed to pay the same to the town of Sanbornton before this division thereof; and the treasurer of the town of Tilton, when duly chosen and qualified, shall have the same power to issue an extent against such collector for any neglect to comply with the provisions of this Act that he would have if such collector had been chosen by said town of Tilton.

"Section 4. All debts and liabilities heretofore incurred by said town of Sanbornton, and all municipal expenses of said town since the first day of March last, shall be paid by the aforesaid towns in the same proportion as heretofore prescribed for the division of property.

"Section 5. All paupers now supported by, and in actual receipt of assistance from, said Sanbornton, shall be supported by the towns of Sanbornton and Tilton, each contributing in the same proportion as heretofore mentioned for the division of property, until such time as either of said towns shall call for a division of said paupers; and if said towns do not agree upon a division, the aforesaid county commissioners, for the time being, shall, upon the request of either of said towns, determine and assign to each of them its proportion of said paupers, upon the same basis, as near as practicable, as that prescribed for a division of the town property, and determine which of said paupers shall be supported by each of said towns.

"Section 6. In all assessment of State and county taxes, until the Legislature shall otherwise order, Sanbornton, as constituted after this division thereof, shall pay $5.15 and Tilton $2.94; and the State and county treasurers shall issue their respective warrants accordingly.

"Section 7. Jeremiah C. Tilton, Alexander H. Tilton, Addison B. Wyatt, or any two of them, may call the first meeting of said town of Tilton by posting up a warrant for that purpose, as the law directs. At which meeting either of said persons may preside until a moderator be chosen, and at such meeting all necessary town officers may be chosen.

"Section 8. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

"SAMUEL M. WHEELER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"JOHN Y. MERRICK, President of the Senate.

"Approved June 30, 1865.

"OSLOW STEARNS, Governor."

From Rev. M. T. Runnels' most valuable "History of Sanbornton" (p. 259) we gather the following statistics:

"According to the provisions of this Act, as we learn from the Sanbornton town records, Tilton's portion of the cash in the treasury was $114.02; Sanbornton's, $338.75, total, —$452.77. Paid in rates: Tilton's portion, 11-20, $48,369.20; Sanbornton's 9-20, $29,774.80; but in reality, Tilton assumed $17 less, $48,352.20, and Sanbornton $17 more, $29,791.80; that sum ($17) being paid by Tilton to Sanbornton in order to distribute the rates between the towns without charging, —$0.64, $57,911. Whole amount of school and pauperage fund, $757;—Tilton's portion, (11-20), $3166.35; Sanbornton's, (9-20), $2599.65. Railroad stock, thirty-eight shares and $30 in scrip, equaling $1839,—Tilton's portion, $1196.50; Sanbornton's, $1723.50, but Tilton takes for its portion twenty-one shares and $30 in scrip, and pays Sanbornton $1.35, and Sanbornton takes seventeen shares for its portion, the scrip only selling for about ten cents on a dollar. Amount of taxes assessed in Sanbornton for 1865 (before division) $17,247.00, Sanbornton's portion, $988.10; Tilton's, $7321.50. Whole amount of real and personal estate sold, $17,007; expenses, $141.78, total, $1668.29, of which received by the town of Tilton, $2,315.53."

The name "Tilton" was adopted by the citizens of the proposed new town at the suggestion of Hon. Charles E. Tilton (the fourth generation in line of descent from the original settler), its wealthiest citizen, whose magnificent gifts to and pride of his native village has done much to render this place one of the most beautiful and attractive in the country.

The name is not in honor of himself individually, but for his ancestry.

Nathaniel Tilton, the patriarch of this family, removed to that part of Sanbornton now Tilton between 1768 and 1771, settling on the farm now owned by Charles W. Colby, nearly a mile north of Tilton village. His name was very prominent in the early history of the first church, of which he was deacon for more than thirty-nine years. He died Feb. 11, 1814.

His son Jeremiah (Colonel) built the original hotel on the site of the Dexter House and occupied the same (see Copp mill). He served in the Revolutionary War six months and was a colonel in the State militia, a justice of the peace, and, in all respects, may be regarded as among the prime founders of this thriving village. He died April 10, 1822, aged sixty years.

His son Samuel, born August 20, 1789, commenced his business career at his father's trip-hammer shop, then occupied the hotel, adding another story to the original building; a man of great business energy and sagacity and always remained at the Bridge village. He accomplished much for its prosperity and was a "living spirit" in the affairs of the town at large for many years. Besides other offices, he was elected Representative five times (1826-29 and 1835); was sheriff, justice of the peace and United States marshal under President Pierce, having previously been chosen one of the State electors for President of the United States in 1848 and delegate to the Baltimore Convention in 1852. As a friend, he was honest, firm and unwavering, and no falsehood or pretense whatever had the least influence in detaching him from those in whom he confided. The records of the schools, seminary and houses of religious worship in his native village will all bear witness that no man among us gave more freely or abundantly than he did towards their establishment; always conservative and patriotic in his feelings, a strong friend of the Union and a most decided and outspoken opponent of all kinds of radicalism.¹ He died November 12, 1861. For an account of his son, Hon. Charles Elliott Tilton, the reader is referred to his biographical sketch.

The Memorial Arch of Tilton, considered as a work of art in its solid and massive completeness, or in the light of the purpose for which it was designed (commemoration of a family name), and erected from the resources of an individual, stands emphatically solitary and alone.

For ages monuments have been chiseled with virtues that once inspired the dust beneath them. Cenotaphs have kept from forgetfulness the memory of the unseparated dead, and obelisks in hieroglyphics are preserved from an older age as reminders of the common desire not to be forgotten. History itself is antedated in discovered symbols honoring the dead among the ruins of forgotten cities.

All these visible tokens are manifestations of that longing for immortality common to the human heart. An impression has gone abroad that the Arch of Tilton is a fac-simile of that of Titus. Such is not the fact, except that the relative proportions are preserved.

The arch on the Sacred Way was built by Vespasian on the return of his son Titus from the capture and destruction of Jerusalem.

It illustrated his triumph in that its inscription bore his name, while profuse carvings, representing Jewish captives bearing the consecrated utensils of the temple, were literal interpretations of actual events. All this is replaced in its American counterpart by the severest simplicity consistent with architectural taste.

The two columns in that of Titus apparently spring from a foundation level with the face of the earth, and are built of marble.

These rise from a cut granite platform approached by five courses of easy steps on all sides, the whole resting on a sub-foundation of solid stone and cement seven feet in depth, in the form of a parallelogram, forty feet by seventy. It is superior in size to the one which for eighteen hundred years has recalled the destruction of that most magnificent temple, the inhuman atrocities of a Roman soldiery and the unparalleled sufferings of the chosen people of God. That emphasizes the glory of potentates, which comes of carnage, slaughter and sanguinary violence; this is the product of peace and prosperity, and announces the blessings of good-will and the liberality of a citizen in the ranks of the people.

Its height is fifty-five feet and its width forty feet. Eight hewn stones make the entire covering, weighing one hundred and thirty thousand pounds. It is most thoroughly constructed, was two years in building and completed without accident.

Its location is on a mound-shaped hill, one hundred and fifty feet above the river, which gently flows at its base. Marl, hard-pau and rock make the elevation, and nothing but an earthquake can disturb the foundation.

The view from the base of the arch is as if one stood in the centre of a vast amphitheatre adorned with every variety of landscape. Within a boundary from Kearsarge and Rugged Mountains in the east to the hills of Meredith in the north, circumscribed by the horizon that marks the highlands to Ossipee and Gilford Mountains in the east and south, the prospect is unobstructed.

Visible at all points of the compass are villages or well-tilled farms nestling on hill-top or slope, teeming with industry and life, while the puff of the locomotive, the shriek of the whistle and the pealing of bells are sounds that come and go with every breeze. Forests that never echoed with the woodman's stroke add completeness to the scene, as if of some genius had designed the broad expanse and filled it with gems of beauty. An extensive traveler, who delights in the beauties of American scenery, says that in extent and diversity it exceeds anything he ever saw. This opinion is confirmed by many others who have visited the site.

A polished device in Scotch granite, on which a Numidian lion is reclining, the whole weighing fifty tons, rests between the two columns of the arch, bearing this inscription,—

"TILTON, 1882."

Each end of the keystone, in raised letters, reads "Memorial Arch of Tilton, 1882." Ten or twelve acres of land are inclosed in the tract on which this memorial has been erected.

Four elegant cut-glass lamps, supplied with gas, are lighted each dark night, making the locality a land-mark for many surrounding miles.

A concrete walk and drive-way for carriages lead to the summit from two different directions. Large numbers of visitors in good weather daily travel over them and avail themselves of the enchanting prospect and a nearer inspection of the arch. It counts one among the many attractions to our thrifty town contributed by Mr. Charles E. Tilton, of the fourth generation from Nathaniel Tilton, the original pioneer of the family, of about one hundred and fifteen years ago.

The old ancestor, at the signal of danger, visible to his clearing on the range above, may sometime have sped his way to the old fort that once occupied the hill. Be that as it may, with all his remembered virtues, there is no sign that, with a prophet's ken, his vision caught sight of the benefactions that were to emanate from his descendant.

It is enough that we possess them, and that the present generation is not insensible to their value or unmindful of the enlarged liberality that gave them form.

Village Advantages.—Tilton village is situated on the old Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad, now known as the White Mountain Division of the Boston and Lowell Railroad, eighteen miles north of Concord, ten miles south of Laconia, the shire-town of the county, and in close proximity to Franklin, at which place the Northern Division of the Boston and Lowell Railroad passes, passenger facilities between these roads being conducted by J. L. Lawrin's twelve-passenger four-horse coach route, which makes two round trips a day, connecting with the important trains over both roads, viz.,—passengers coming down over the White Mountain road and wishing to go up over the Northern, instead of going to Concord, take this stage and save over thirty-six miles travel. Quick time and sure connections are made as they carry the United States mail. Daily stage leaves here for Sanbornton and New Hampton and semi-daily stage for Belmont and Gilmanton.

The railroad facilities are very good, the track laid with steel rails and a ride of but two hours and forty minutes from Boston; while passengers taking the two p. m. train arrive in New York at half-past ten the same day. The past summer twelve passenger trains have stopped here daily; the passenger Pullman and Mann boudoir coaches were of the best, and the road earned the reputation of being the best equipped of any in New England. The passenger station is a model for size, comfort and convenience, modern in its construction, the inside finished in hard woods, heated by steam, lighted by gas and contains all conveniences for passenger and railroad facilities.

A charter has been granted to build and operate a railroad from this place to Belmont. Application has been made to the Grand Court for right to construct a railroad from here to Franklin, and there is a bright prospect of seeing the road in operation within three years.

The location of the town offers unusual water-power facilities, which, by its proximity to the leading lines of transportation, should place it foremost in the ranks for manufacturing industries. The quantity, quality, purity from sediment cannot be excelled in the United States. It contains no lime, iron or other injurious material held in solution to deaden the colors used in dyeing; no sawdust or vegetable material to prevent the proper washing of wool. It drains no territory containing tanneries and filthy material, and is as pure drinking water as can be found in flowing streams.

With Lake Winnepiseogee back of us, a dam across its outlet into Winnepiseogee River, retaining her waters to such an extent that the water-power company can prevent its overflow to not less than two hundred and fifty cubic feet per second (the dam being five hundred and two feet above mean tide), with an unobstructed flow of water from Great Bay, or Winnepesaukee Lake, containing 2,003,729,124 square feet to Middle Bay, of two miles in length and three-fourths of a mile in width, thence to Little Bay and to the falls at East Tilton. There is not an obstruction on this great body of water. At East Tilton is a large, strong dam affording an immense power, which at present is only utilized by Byron W. Brown at his mill, and he has built a short canal.

Such is the water-power here that, before efforts were made to start water-power manufacturing at Manchester, it was determined to use the power at this place, and, with that object in view, the water-power party closed negotiations for the land thereabout. It is a fact that, but for the stubbornness of one man, the great industries of Manchester would have been located here. Below this first dam is another fall of water unutilized. This power lies idle and with a small expense could be utilized, and is particularly valuable on account of its nearness to the railroad.

The first dam across the river at Tilton allows the present fall of eight feet, and Ballantyne & Fletcher have the right to flow back to East Tilton, a distance of two miles. The power is only utilized by Messrs. Ballantyne & Fletcher, proprietors of the Granite Mill, manufacturers of ladies' woolen dress-goods. They employ seventy hands, with a pay-roll of two thousand dollars per month, and at present make fifteen thousand yards of six-fourth cloth a month. On their side of the river are two good privileges. At the other end of the dam is an equally good unoccupied mill-site. The next dam below is occupied by Copp's grist-mill, Dodge's hosiery-mill, and the other end by Richard Firth, proprietor of the Elm Mill, who manufactures about the same quality of goods as Ballantyne & Fletcher, running three looms.

Continuing down-stream is the colfer-dam, with a water-fall of eleven feet. George E. Buel & Co.'s large hosiery-mill occupy one end of the dam; they employ ninety operatives and do an annual business amounting to from one hundred and thirty thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The cotton-mill at the other end is being converted into a shoe manufactory by the Pillsbury Brothers. They will employ not less than three hundred people with a monthly pay-roll of ten thousand dollars. Here are certainly two splendid privileges. Next in order is the Tilton Mills, who only occupy one end of the dam with a twelve-foot fall of water. The other end is unoccupied and the land and power can be bought remarkably cheap. From the above we find there are nine water privileges, all dammed, and free use of the power is guaranteed. This is exclusive of the power at East Tilton.

Forty-four rods below the Tilton Mill is a fifteen-foot fall; forty-four rods below the last is a fall of twenty-three feet; these falls are undeveloped. Adjoining land to all these privileges will be disposed of at a very reasonable figure to persons who will erect mills and run them. When one thinks of the manufacturing industries conducted at Manchester, Lawrence and Lowell, and that their power comes from here, it seems surprising that so much steam-power is utilized, when water-power can be obtained under such favorable circumstances, and all within half a mile of the railroad. The fall of Winnepiseogee River, from Great Bay through this town, is some one hundred and forty feet, and the whole fall of the river two hundred feet.

Statistical.—The census of the town in 1870 was 1117; in 1880, 1282, and by reference to the Governor and other votes the voting population will be found. The selectmen's valuation in 1876 was $635,008.

Following is the selectmen's inventory made in the spring of 1885:

Number of polls, 330, $33,000; horses, 197, $13,000; land and buildings (6585 acres), $391,930; oxen, 56, $2795; cows, 277, $7421; other meat stock, 110, $2259; sheep, 220, $657; hogs taxable, 16, $102; carriages, 61, $4455; stock in public funds, $6200; money, $290.80; stock in trade, $48,065; mills, $48,790; total valuation, $608,001; total taxes, including highway, $958.39; rate per cent. on all, $1.50; on each, $1.00; poll-tax, $1.13.

The assets of the town March 1, 1885, $6886.88, leaving a net indebtedness of $12,324.11.

Water.—At the northeast portion of the town is a small portion of Lake Winnisquam, or, as it was called in old times, Great Bay. Continuing south is the Sanbornton or Middle Bay, some two miles in length and three-fourths of a mile in width, whose waters flow into Little Bay, constituting the third of these bays, which are most picturesque and beautiful bodies of water, affording boating and fishing, and many are the pleasures enjoyed on their cool, clear waters in the summer, while in the winter they are famous resorts for the fishermen, who, fishing through the ice, generally meet with good success. The southern shores of the town are washed by the Winnepesaukee River, whose falls afford water-power for many and varied industries.

Bamford, Gulf, Hunt, Packer and Meadow Brooks are the principal small streams of water.

The surface is generally uneven, being diversified with hills and valleys. Some of the hills are quite elevations, but most of them can be cultivated to their summits. The soil throughout the town is very good, and produces all the crops cultivated in this climate.

Villages.—The business portion of the town is at Tilton, formerly known as Sanbornton Bridge, situated on the Winnepesaukee River, where it forms the boundary line between this town and Northfield, the business portion of Northfield being situated on the southern side of the river, in Merrimack County. Their manufacturing interests, post-office, Fire Precinct and village improvement societies being in common, both villages are known as Tilton; the post-office of Northfield proper being at the depot, four miles from Tilton. The villages are connected by two elegant iron bridges, completed in the spring of 1882, at a cost to both towns of $5500, the upper one costing $3250, of which Mr. Charles E. Tilton paid $500, the sum being equally divided between the towns. The upper bridge is much more elaborate and ornamental, with high arching truss.

In addition to the manufacturing industries there are twenty-two stores, seven halls, three churches, one hotel, two hay stables, one steam laundry, an elegant brick building containing the post-office, town-hall, town offices and one store and bank.

The villages are united in what is known as the Fire Precinct, which was formed in 1867, the fire apparatus consisting of two hand-engines; the large one having eight-inch cylinder, and requiring fifty men to properly operate, and throwing a stream one hundred and sixty feet. The small is the most efficient. Both tubs are kept in good condition. They have fifteen hundred feet of hose, and with the mill-pumps answer all ordinary requirements.

The village has extensively suffered from fires,—first, when it was part of Sanbornton in 1838; again, the 7th of November, 1863; and the most destructive fire which has occurred in the town took place on the 27th of May, 1875, involving a loss of sixty thousand dollars, for an account of which the reader is referred to the Lacoin Democrat, June 3, 1875.

Village Improvement Association was formed at the time Rev. Lucius Waterman was pastor of the Episcopal Church (1879-81), he being the prime mover in forming the association which has done much towards beautifying the place; principally through their efforts, some two miles of concrete walk has been laid, street-lamps added and other improvements made.

East Tilton Village, situated four miles east of Tilton, on the railroad, is a thriving hamlet, containing two stores, owned respectively by Chase Rollins and William C. Mulgett; the former is postmaster; both keep good stock of such goods as are usually found in country stores. Here are two churches, school-house and twenty-five or thirty dwellings. Byron W. Brown has a large saw-mill, with a capacity of getting out twelve thousand feet of lumber a day, in addition he has a shingle-mill; also a grist-mill with three run of stones, one set of which is used for flour, and employs twelve men.

Tin Corner, once a thriving hamlet, containing a hotel, store, blacksmith, shoe-making, house-joiner and cabinet-maker shops and a large tin-ware establishment. All have succumbed to the inevitable and nothing but farming is left.

Religious Societies.—THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF NORTHFIELD AND TILTON is the oldest and contains the largest number of communicants. The church was formed on the Northfield side of the river in 1806, where it continued till the 4th of February, 1857, at which time the present church, on this side of the river, was dedicated. The house contains a large vestry and committee-rooms with modern improvement. In 1880 the building was thoroughly repaired, the old tower was taken down and the present one erected. At the completion of Rev. Nathan P. Philbrook's pastorate there were two hundred and fifteen members and thirty-nine on probation.

The following have been the pastors since the incorporation of the town: Rev. Charles W. Millen, 1870-71; Rev. William H. Jones, 1872-73; Rev. Lewis P. Cushman, 1874; Rev. John W. Adams, 1875-76; Rev. Silas E. Quimby, 1877-78; Rev. Nelson M. Bailey, 1879-80; Rev. Nathan P. Philbrook, 1881-83; Rev. Charles S. Nutter, to present time.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF NORTHFIELD AND TILTON was organized in the former town July 18, 1822, and has continued an active and successful church. The present building was erected in this town in 1837. In 1869-70 the house was elevated, a vestry and pastor's rooms placed underneath the church and the whole building thoroughly repaired. In 1881 the old pews were removed, modern ones added, the floor leveled, an addition built at the rear for the organ, which was built over, and gas added, the whole expense amounting to six thousand dollars.

Rev. Corban Curtice was pastor at the time of incorporating the town, continuing until the following year; succeeded by Rev. Theodore C. Pratt, 1870-75; Rev. Frederick T. Perkins, 1875-80; Rev. C. B. Strong, July 1, 1884, to May 3, 1885; Rev. C. C. Sampson, May 15, 1885.

TRINITY PARISH (EPISCOPAL) CHURCH OF TILTON was organized by Dr. James H. Eames, of Concord, in the fall of 1860, securing the temporary services of Rev. B. Colburn, who officiated some three or four months. The society purchased the brick edifice formerly occupied by the Methodist Episcopal Church, on the Northfield side of the river, put the same in thorough repair at a total expense of some three thousand dollars, which was duly consecrated on the 1st of October, 1861, by the Rt. Rev. Carlton C. Chase, bishop of the diocese.

The Rev. Marcellus A. Herrick, D.D., however, is regarded as the founder of the church, he removing to Northfield, and for fifteen years was most effective and unwearied in promoting the interests of his parish.

Dr. Herrick took charge of the parish as rector on the 15th of February, 1861, and continued until his death, October 31, 1875. When he settled here the church had but a single communicant within the limits of the parish. April 1, 1861, the first regular parish-meeting was held and church officers elected. In 1872 the foundation of their new house of worship was laid in Tilton. It was tastefully and substantially built of brick, and on Easter Sunday, April 13, 1873, services were held in it for the first time. The house was consecrated May 25, 1875, by Rt. Rev. William W. Niles, bishop of the diocese of New Hampshire. The whole cost of the lot, building, organ and other furniture was about fifteen thousand dollars. Mrs. Dr. Eames, of Concord, presented the chancel window. On the left is a large painting from Richelieu done at Rome, representing Christ delivering the keys to Saint Peter with the injunction: "Feed my Sheep."

The building is forty-two by sixty-two, with a large tower at the north-west corner, and is a most beautiful structure.

After the death of Dr. Herrick, Rev. Frank S. Harrahen was rector for one year from the spring of 1876; Rev. Henry H. Haynes, rector for one and a half years (1877-79); Rev. Lucius Waterman (1879-81), Rev. Frederick C. Cowper acting as assistant during the time Mr. Waterman was in Europe (1881). Rev. Isaac Peck, rector over a year closing his services in October 1885.

FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH AT EAST TILTON was organized March 27, 1827. In June, 1834, they built a house of worship, forty-eight by forty, thirteen feet post, costing $835.73. In 1861 the building was turned round and remodeled at an expense of nine hundred dollars. In 1876 the building was again repaired and put in good condition.

The following had been the pastors since incorporation:

Rev. Gilman Sanborn, September 1, 1869, till June, 1870; Rev. Otis F. Russell, June, 1870, to May, 1871; Rev. E. Preston Moulton, May, 1871, to May 4, 1872; Rev. Mr. Walker resided at Laconia and occupied the pulpit nearly one year; Rev. John G. Munsey, May, 1873, till February 29, 1878; Rev. J. Herbert Yeoman, from June 1, 1878, two years; Rev. William H. Yeoman, 1880 till March, 1884; Rev. John G. Munsey, the present incumbent.

METHODIST CHURCH AT EAST TILTON was built previous to 1835 and thoroughly repaired in 1879, and since the incorporation of the town nine pastors have most acceptably filled the ministerial positions with their people.

Educational—NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE SEMINARY AND FEMALE COLLEGE.—SITUATED ON Academy Hill, just north of the village and facing the south, overlooking the village, the valley of the Winnipisseege River and a panorama of mountains and quiet valleys, is situated the above seminary, composed of three buildings: the central is surmounted by a cupola. It contains the president's office, chapel, reading-room and well-furnished recitation-rooms on the two lower stories, and a spacious hall in the upper story. Three rods from either extremity of this main building are two other three-story buildings, that on the west being the ladies' boarding-house, that on the east being devoted to male teachers and students. These buildings are of brick, and during the summer of 1886 extensive alterations will be made, which will unite the three buildings in one, and the central will have a large clock placed in the tower.

During the year 1845 the first seminary building was erected on the Northfield side of the river, on the site now occupied by Miss Hannah Houghton.

The building was of brick and was unpretending in appearance. In 1857 the building was found inadequate, and in August of that year a commodious and substantial edifice was dedicated, where, under one roof, the faculty and students found a pleasant home.

On the night of November 7, 1862, the structure was destroyed by fire and the school left homeless. "The old site was abandoned and the present and more desirable location adopted. During the darkest days of the Rebellion the buildings were completed and consecrated (August 24, 1864) to their noble work—the education of the young. Although under control of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the school is by no means sectarian. It has ever enjoyed a liberal patronage from Christian parents of every denomination."¹ Among its graduates are found ten eminent lawyers, two members of Congress and one New Hampshire State officer, a number of successful business men, at least ten prominent clergymen, one distinguished theological author, four physicians and ten professors. All branches of education are taught, including music, art, language and scientific course. The institution was under the management of Rev. Silas E. Quimby, A.M., until 1885, to whom much credit is due for the successful and able manner in which the institution is conducted. Rev. D. C. Knowles, A.M., became president succeeding Rev. Mr. Quimby, and is bringing the school to a higher grade.

UNION SCHOOL DISTRICT, No. 1, was formed out of Districts Nos. 2 and 28 (old districts in Sanborn-ton), in Tilton, and District No. 10, in Northfield; the first officers being appointed by the selectmen April 16, 1872, consisting of W. Baleom, of Northfield, Adam S. Ballantyne, Charles B. Garmon and Samuel J. Tilton, prudential committee. There being a question of the legality of this union, a special act of the General Court was granted. Pending the granting of this act, a meeting was held, May 28, 1872, at the school-house in No. 28 (which stood on what is now the Park, owned by Mrs. A. H. Tilton, at the west part of the village,—the school-house being subsequently sold, moved west of its old location and fitted for a dwelling-house), and Charles T. Hill elected clerk pro tem. The action of this meeting was that Messrs. W. S. Clark, Charles C. Rogers and Franklin J. Eastman were chosen a building committee to select the site, put in the foundation and superintend the erection of the school-house. The plan of Mr. Arthur Smyth for a building costing four thousand four hundred dollars was accepted, and a sum of money not exceeding five thousand dollars was voted to purchase land and erect the buildings, three thousand dollars being raised by taxation and the balance being borrowed at a low rate of interest. One-half acre of land was given by Mr. Franklin J. Eastman on the Northfield side of the river, and the present building erected. In March, 1873, the building committee reported the cost of the building, $4947.35, and the entire cost, including wells, pumps, etc., at $5130.73.

After the act of incorporation was granted, the citizens met, September 4, 1872, and chose a Board of Education, as follows: Rev. Marcellus A. Herrick, Rev. Theodore C. Pratt and Rev. John B. Robinson.

The check-list was first used at the annual meeting in 1883. Three schools are kept in the building, consisting of primary, intermediate and grammar departments, and the schools are fully up to the standard. The district schools consist of five in number, situated as follows: No. 1, at Tin Corner (it was the first school district in the old town of Sanborn-ton); No. 2, on the Sanborn road; No. 3, at East Tilton village; No. 4, above Tilton village; No. 5, above East Tilton, and known as the Rollins District. With the exception of the graded school, no new buildings have been erected, but all are in thorough repair and conveniently situated. The average length of the school term is not far from thirty-six weeks a year.

MILLS.—TILTON MILLS.—In 1828, Nathaniel Holmes removed here from Meredith, and built the first cotton-mill for making yarn and warp on the site of the present Tilton Mills. The mill was forty by fifty feet, and did much towards giving Tilton its prosperity.

"In 1839, Colonel A. H. Tilton put two sets of woolen machinery into this mill and started on cassimeres; he invented and made the all-wool goods known as Tweeds. The mill property, embracing seventy-five acres, and extending one-third of a mile down the river, controls an immense water-power, with twelve feet fall at the mills, fifteen feet fall forty-four rods farther down and twenty-three feet fall forty-four rods below the last."² Colonel Tilton was soon obliged to enlarge the mill, and in 1865 doubled its capacity.

The mill property consists of the main building, dye-house, picker-house, sorting, dye, finishing and waste-houses as separate buildings. "The Tilton tweeds" have attained a wide celebrity, and for years were manufactured exclusively, but as times changed and the market required, meltons have been gradually added, and up to the present time the mills have made fifty-five styles of goods. All the narrow looms have given place to the broad looms, of which there are twenty. The mill is equipped with four sets of woolen machinery. There has recently been added one new set of cards, a hydro-extractor, Brammel's self-feeders and a rotary fulling-mill, a Bigelow steam boiler of sixty-four horse-power, a new Rodney & Hunt turbine water-wheel, a new dye-house, and the capacity of the finishing-room has been doubled. They give employment to seventy-five hands, with a monthly pay-roll of two thousand dollars, and manufacture three thousand six hundred yards of cloth per month.

BAILEY, OR WINNISQUAM, COTTON MILL was built in 1868 by R. M. Bailey, and now owned by the New Hampshire Manufacturing Company (Dexter, Abbott & Co., Boston). The factory is of wood, one hundred and sixty by fifty-eight feet, three stories in height, with basement. Mr. Charles T. Almy was the last lessee, manufacturing cotton yarns and sileris or fine sheetings, operating seven thousand three hundred spindles, and employed fifty hands. The mill has remained vacant since Mr. Almy vacated it, the 1st of January, 1884.

In the fall of 1885 this mill was sold to J. A. & A. J. Pillsbury, under the firm-name of Pillsbury Brothers, shoe manufacturers of Northwood, who are remodeling the mill preparatory to occupying the whole as a shoe manufactory.

LORD BROTHERS' MANUFACTURING COMPANY.—In 1877, Messrs. J. S. Towle and Albert C. Lord, under the firm-name of Towle & Lord, began the manufacture of eye-glasses in one end of Hazen Copp's woolen-mill, giving employment to four hands. As they grew in experience and perfected their machinery so the demand for their goods increased and more room was required. November 22, 1877, Mr. Towle sold out to George W. Lord, and the firm-name continues as above, Mr. Towle still continuing in their employ. In the summer of 1878 the brothers erected their present thoroughly-constructed building for their steam factory, situated on Main Street, opposite the depot. The building is thirty-two feet front, eighty feet long, having two high-posted stories and basement, and costing some ten thousand dollars. Since then they have added a wing twenty by forty-two feet and two stories high. They removed to this building the 1st of January, 1879. They employ from thirty-five to forty workmen, and do an annual business of from fifty thousand to sixty-five thousand dollars, having the largest special factory in the United States. Their speciality is eye-glasses, from the common to the best French pebble, and a patented metallic spectacle-case. Although not making bows for spectacles, yet they do considerable in setting the lenses. Mr. Albert Lord has just patented an adjustable nose-piece for eye-glasses, which grips the sides of the nose without causing any undue pressure, and will not slip from the nose during movements of the nasal muscles.

In addition to their factory, they have a large wholesale and retail jewelry-store and large drug-store.

TILTON MACHINE-SHOP.—Benjamin C. Stevens, proprietor, established himself in Franklin in 1872, and in December, 1882, removed to Tilton, occupying the shop in the rear of Lord Brothers' Manufacturing Company, and using their steam-power. The proprietor possesses considerable inventive skill, and makes a speciality of drafting and making difficult machinery for special work. He has originated very complicated labor-saving machinery, and, as it was for special purposes, it has never been patented. He employs five hands, and does all kinds of iron repair-work.

COPP GRIST-MILL.—On the site now occupied by this mill was erected the first in our retiring industry at Sanbornton Bridge. It is a trip-hammer, or the-shog and gins mill, conducted by Tilton & Smith, and erected as early as 1788. Benjamin Smith is said to have built the first house in what is now Tilton village.

In 1872, Mr. Hazen Copp built the present, thirty-five by sixty, twostory grist-mill, fitted it with modern improvements, four run of stones, a flour-mill and two bolting machines, and at present conducts the business. In 1877 Mr. Copp built the mill just below, now occupied by Mr. Arthur M. Dodge as a hosiery manufactory. The mill is thirty-five by sixty, three stories in height, the machinery in both mills being run by the same fall of water. The estimated value of both mills is fifteen thousand dollars.

DOBBS' MILL.—Late in the Fall of 1881, Mr. Arthur M. Dodge, of Franklin, leased the old Godyin Mill, owned by Hazen Copp, and put in one set of cards, and began the manufacture of all wool Shaker hose, weighing two pounds, four ounces per dozen. He has twenty one knitting-machines, ten of which knit the hose entire. The mill started up January 1, 1885; employs twenty-eight operatives, with a monthly pay roll of seven hundred dollars.

Societies.—DORM LODGE, No. 78, A. F. AND A. M., organized July 2, 1896, and consists of eighty-eight members. Past Masters: Adam S. Ballantine, John Fletcher, Frank L. Mason, John F. Eastman, Samuel Condon, Jr., Daniel W. Page, Selwin B. Peasey, Charles R. Gould, James L. Mowe.

HARMONY LODGE, No. 65, I. O. O. F., was instituted April 13, 1881. Charter members are as follows: Sidney E. Smith, Enoch G. Clark, LeRoy S. Atkinson, Albert A. Adams, John W. Watts, Frank W. Hurlburt, Otis C. Hurlburt, Frank W. Fletcher, Albert C. Muzzey, Enoos H. Johnson, A. G. Arnold and Frederick A. Clement.

Following is the list of the first officers: G. E. Smith, N. G.; E. G. Clark, V. G.; L. S. Atkinson, Sec.; A. A. Adams, Treas.; J. M. Watts, W.; F. W. Hurlburt, C.; A. C. Muzzey, N. G. R. S.; T. W. Long, N. G. L. S.; F. W. Fletcher, V. G. R. S.; E. C. Healy, V. G. L. S.; A. Arnold, R. S. S.; F. A. Clement, L. S. S.; E. H. Johnson, I. G.; O. C. Hurlburt, O. G.; M. C. Abbott, Chap.

KNIGHTS OF HONOR, No. 928, was instituted in this place February 7, 1878. They have a fine hall and reception-rooms adjoining. The floors are laid with birch, the other wood work is ash, the lining is handsomely frescoed and the furniture is new. There are forty in members, and but six deaths have occurred since their organization.

CLEMENT LODGE, No. 151, KNIGHTS AND LADIES OF HONOR, like the former, is a ch. trade organization, consisting of ladies and gentlemen, this lodge having a third more of the former than of the latter members. The lodge was organized in August, 1883, and has forty-four members.

MINNEHAHA DIVISION, No. 8, SONS OF TEMPERANCE, was organized April 23, 1883, with twelve charter members. The lodge has steadily increased in numbers and influence, and most of the young people are members and constant attendants. They have a fine hall in Hill's Block.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF GOOD TEMPLARS, under the name of Tilton, No. 52, was formed August 7, 1885. The organization has some forty members, meets weekly and is in a flourishing condition.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.—Organized in March 1863, has a large number of members, and is in a flourishing condition.

THE TILTON CORNET BAND was organized in June, 1880, consisting of twenty pieces, and finely uniformed. W. P. Long is president; T. J. Davis, treasurer; Nathan S. Cheaver, secretary; and Frederick Clement, director.

POST No. 62, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC, was organized on the 6th of October, 1881, with twelve charter members, and named "Adams K. Tilton," in honor of that gentleman, who was born in that part of Sanbornton now included in Tilton, February 21, 1833; son of John A. and Clarissa (Kimball) Tilton; grandson of Jacob, and great-grandson of Nathaniel and Abigail (Gilman) Tilton.

Mr. Tilton resided in his native town until 1853, when he removed to Pawtucket, R. I., and followed his trade, that of a sash, door and blind-maker; married Miss Ellen Elizabeth Arnold in May, 1864, at that time being a soldier. He first enlisted in the First Rhode Island Regiment in 1861, and was afterwards captain of one of the companies in the Sixth New Hampshire Infantry. He was instantly killed by a shot which penetrated the brain just over the eye, in an action at Poplar Grove Church, Va., September 30, 1864.

The organization has had thirty-six members, and at present has twenty-nine. When first organized they met in Knights of Honor Hall, then in the Northfield town hall, and May 11, 1882 removed to their present hall in Hill's Block.

Following is the list of the first officers chosen, and the "Roster" at this time (1885):

First officers: Commander, George E. Dow; S. V. C., Leander H. Irving; J. V. C., L. D. Miller; Chaplain, Otis C. Wyatt; Surgeon, A. A. Moulton, M.D.; Officer of the Day, T. K. Bean; Officer of the Guard, C. H. Davis; Quartermaster, S. A. Clark; Adjutant, Charles W. Tilton; Sergeant-Major, Charles W. Davenport; Quartermaster-Sergeant, Francis Schiatt.

Present officers: Commander, Charles W. Tilton; S. V. C., William H. Tripp; J. V. C., Charles H. Davis; Chaplain, Otis C. Wyatt; Surgeon, A. A. Moulton, M.D.; Officer of the Day, Leander Irving; Officer of the Guard, Francis Schiatt; Quartermaster, John Haslom; Adjutant, George E.

Dow; Sergeant-Major, Lorenzo D. Miller; Quartermaster Sergeant, Edgar A. Porter.

Banks.—The charter of the original State Bank of Sanbornton Bridge, known as the "Citizens' Bank," was granted in June, 1853. The first meeting was held the 3rd of the following August. Asa P. Cate chosen president, and Charles Minot, of Concord, cashier; Samuel Tilton, Thomas Chase, Benjamin Hill, Isaac Whittier, John Kenniston and Woodbury Melcher, directors. These gentlemen were men of influence, of more than ordinary mental capacity and universally respected for business capacity. The capital stock was fifty thousand dollars. Mr. Minot owned the present house of William T. Cass, and the business was started in the room now occupied for that purpose. In 1855, Mr. Cass bought the property, and succeeded Mr. Minot as cashier. As time passed on, considerable feeling and disagreement arose in the minds of the stockholders and officers in changing its character from State to a National Bank. At a meeting of the officers of the bank, held February 20, 1865, Woodbury Melcher made a motion that the bank be changed to a National, and, on a vote being taken, Messrs. Austin F. Pike, Eleazer Davis, Robert Gray and Woodbury Melcher voted in the affirmative, and Asa P. Cate in the negative. Agreeable to this vote, a national charter was obtained, and it was intended to have the capital one hundred thousand dollars, but, through delay, it only reached seventy thousand dollars. It became known as the Citizens' National Bank of Tilton.

The first meeting, after obtaining their second charter, was held May 25, 1865, and consisted of the following directors: Asa P. Cate, Austin F. Pike, Woodbury Melcher, Eleazer Davis, John Kenniston, Robert Gray and E. S. Wadleigh. Mr. Cate was chosen president, and William T. Cass cashier. From the time the bank was started, in 1853, to the present time (1885), the average semi-annual dividend has been 4 per cent. The charter has recently been extended to March 20, 1905.

IONA SAVINGS-BANK, organized in 1870, with perpetual charter. The first meeting was held July 30th, with the following directors: Asa P. Cate, Benjamin F. Cofran, Eleazer Davis, J. Frank Taylor, Addison B. Wyatt, John Kenniston, A. H. Tilton, Milton Gerrish and B. T. Brown. A. P. Cate was chosen president, and William T. Cass treasurer.

Eleazer Davis made the first deposit of one thousand dollars, and Arthur T. Cass made the second. The former has been withdrawn. For a number of years the dividends have amounted to five per cent.

From the bank commissioners' report of 1884 we gather the following facts: A. S. Ballantyne, president; William T. Cass, treasurer. Amount due depositors, $270,388.10; guaranty fund, $4300; surplus, $7181.01; net earnings for the year 1883, $14,372.96; expenses for the year 1883, $896.95.

Physicians and Lawyers.—The following sketches are from Rev. Mr. Runkel's "History of Sanbornton" (vol. i., pp. 239-240):

DR. BYLIE LYFORD (1857) was the son of Jeremiah and Naomi (Dickey) Lyford, and was born June 25, 1822, in Stanstead, C. E. He attended school in Newbury, this State, studied his profession in Campton, and graduated at the Dartmouth Medical College, Hanover, in 1849. Having practiced one year in Campton, three years in Hillsborough and four years in Nashua, he became established at the Bridge (Tilton), in this town, in the eighth year after his graduation, and here for eighteen years continued in practice till his sudden death, January 23, 1875. . . . He was highly prized in this and the adjoining towns for his medical skill and kindly sympathy for those in distress. "One of the ablest physicians in New Hampshire." He was married in Nashua, March 6, 1851, to Vashiti P., daughter of Hon. Zedaliah and Vashiti Shattuck; one child, Mrs. George G. Trowbridge, resides in Chelsea, Mass.

DR. JAMES PRESOTT OSBORNE (1864) was born June 3, 1833, in Piermont, being the son of Cyrus and Sally C. (Thresher) Osborn. . . . Graduated at the Dartmouth Medical College in 1855. He first practiced at Felchlev, Vt., eight years. . . . In the fall of 1864 he came to Sanbornton Bridge (Tilton) and entered into partnership with Dr. Lyford for three years, from December 12th, since dissolving which (1867) he has maintained an extensive practice by himself till the present. . . . He married Sally P. Stanyan, of Wentworth, March 18, 1855. One child, Flora G., born October 6, 1862.

DR. FRANKLIN L. WASON (1870) resided on the Sanborn road, in Tilton. He had a successful practice in his immediate neighborhood, in other parts of Tilton and the adjoining towns. In 1877 he relinquished practice and removed to Meredith village, where he has a drug-store. He was born in Freedom August 18, 1834. He married, first, Amanda C., daughter of Ebenezer Colby, August, 1852, died December 27, 1869; married, second, Mrs. Carrie Phillbrick) W. Meeks, November 28, 1872.

DR. ALBERT ALONZO MOULTON (1874) was the son of Jonathan and Mary (Morse) Moulton, and was born in Meredith October 6, 1829; studied medicine at Bristol and Hanover, and graduated M.D. at the Dartmouth Medical College, 1859. He practiced at Meredith six years, and in Concord from 1856 till 1874, including one year as surgeon in the Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, by which service his health was seriously impaired. He has practiced in Tilton since 1874 to the present. . . . Married Anna Maria Sawyer, of Bristol, May, 1859; died in Concord June, 1872. One son, Arthur C., resides in Colorado.

JOHN J. DLARBOEN, M.D., removed to Tilton in December, 1881. (See "History of Salisbury.")

Lawyers.—HON. ASA PIPER CUTL (1849-71) was a native of Northfield, the eldest child of Simon, Jr., and Lydia Durgin, born June 1, 1813. He read law with Hon. G. W. Nesmith at Franklin, and began practice in his native town, which he represented in the Legislature, 1839-49, and at several other times. In 1841 he was a member of the Senate and president of the same in 1845, and railroad commissioner three years. In 1858-60 he was the Democratic candidate for Governor of the State. As president of the Citizens' National Bank (which see) and largely interested in the Boston, Concord and Montreal and White Mountain Railroad, he represented the moneyed interests of the place. July 24, 1871, he was appointed judge of Probate for Merrimack County, holding the office until near his death. His law-office was in Judge Atkinson's old office, which stood at the south end of Hill's Block. "He was a genial gentleman and enjoyed the confidence of his townsmen and acquaintances to a large degree. An adept in horticulture and a lover of his well-tilled acres, the homestead in Northfield, where for many years he resided, was always made peculiarly attractive to those who visited him. He lived and died a conscientious Christian, greatly mourned and missed as a pillar of the Episcopal Church and Society in Northfield and Tilton. He died December 12, 1874, and his funeral was attended by nearly all the members of the Belknap and Merrimack bars. He married Clara Proctor, September 2, 1849," three children being born to them.

CHARLES C. ROGERS, Esq. (1858), born at Broomfield, Vt., August 19, 1834; read law with his cousin, Benjamin A. Rogers, Esq., at Tilton, succeeding him in practice in April, 1858. He enjoys a large and lucrative practice, and has the confidence of the people. In June, 1874, he was appointed county solicitor; removed by address of Legislature in July, 1876; elected to the same office in November, 1878, and re-elected in 1880.

Married August 27, 1860, Sophia Curry. Children: (1) John W., born October, 1861, graduated from Dartmouth College in 1883, resides at San Antonio, Texas, and is a professor of languages and the higher mathematics in S. Mary's Hall, a seminary for girls; (2) Carol B., born April 28, 1863, died February 27, 1873; (3) Arthur, born January 25, 1870, died February 26, 1873; (4) George Bell, born September 25, 1874; (5) Herbert S., born April 29, 1877.

FRANCIS R. CHASE, Esq. (1866-76), a native of Gilmanton; read law with Judge Dana, of Fryeburg, Me., and was admitted to the bar soon after his marriage, in 1844, to Huldh P. Fessenden. He removed to Northfield in 1866, opening an office in Tilton. He represented the town of Northfield in the Legislature in 1871-72, and was a prominent member of the Episcopal Society. He died March 12, 1876, in his fifty-eighth year.

JAMES OGIS LYFORD, Esq. (1880-82), the son of James Lyford, was born in Boston, Mass., June 28, 1833. He graduated at the New Hampshire Conference Seminary in 1872; read law at Concord; was a member of the Constitutional Convention from Canterbury in 1876, and for the years 1877-79 edited, the People at Concord. He was admitted to the bar in 1880 and opened an office in Eastman's Block, Tilton; married, May 2, 1882, Susan A. Hill, and soon after took up his residence at Washington, D. C., where he is engaged in one of the departments.

WALTER D. HARDY, Esq. (1882-84), son of Anthony C. and Eliza (Martin) Hardy, born at Lebanon June 27, 1857; graduated at Penacook Academy (Concord); taught in the same one year; read law with Sargent & Chase, of Concord, in 1878-80, then with Hon. E. B. S. Sanborn at Franklin Falls; admitted to the bar in August, 1881; continuing with Esquire Sanborn till the spring of 1882, when he removed to Tilton and took Esquire Lyford's place. At the fall election, in 1882, he was elected solicitor for Belknap County, assuming the position in July, 1883, and held it until July, 1885, although, November 1, 1884, he became associated as partner with Hon. E. B. S. Sanborn at Franklin, under the firm-name of Sanborn & Hardy. He was succeeded by WILLIAM B. FELLOWS, Esq., son of Colonel E. Q. and Mary E. (Quimby) Fellows; born at Sandwich, July 5, 1858; took a college preparatory course at the New Hampshire Conference Seminary and Female College, completing the three years' course in the spring of 1876; entered Dartmouth College, from which he graduated in 1880 and immediately began the study of law under Hon. E. A. Hibbard, of Laconia; admitted to the bar the 1st of September, 1883, and opened an office at Ashland, where he was married to Ida G. Scribner, November 1, 1881; two children; removed to Tilton in the fall of 1884.

Postmasters—TILTON.—Bradbury M. Morrill, appointed April 19, 1869, the office being in the Colby house, west of the hotel; office changed name from Sanbornston Bridge to Tilton July 21, 1869.

Jeremiah C. Tilton, appointed January 23, 1871, he removing the office back to the corner store, on the site of the present town hall.

George W. Tilton, appointed July 15, 1872. The office again moved back to the Colby building.

Daniel F. Hill, appointed March 10, 1877, and is the present incumbent. After the town-hall building was completed, it was removed to its present ample and well-furnished accommodations.

EAST TILTON.—Chase Rollins, appointed November 23, 1868, and still continues; name changed to East Tilton July 21, 1869.

Town Officers.—Until 1795 the State law required that the annual meeting for the election of State, county and town officers should be held the last Tuesday in March, when the day was changed to the second Tuesday. On the revision of the State Constitution, the law was so changed that the State and county officers, including town representatives and Board of Supervisors, were elected biennially, in November, the first election under this form occurring in November, 1877.

The first meeting for the election of town officers was held on the 17th of July, 1869.

CHARLES E. TILTON.

Deacon Nathaniel Tilton, whose descendants have borne a prominent part in all that has made the renown of Sanbornton back to a period of time antedating the Revolution to the present, little thought, and perhaps cared less, that the date of his settlement and the place from which he came would ever be shaded with uncertainty.

He removed from Stratham or New Market, and settled on the lot now owned by Charles W. Colby & Son somewhere between 1768 and 1771.

In November of the latter year he signed the original church covenant, his signature being the second on that instrument.

Less than two months later he was chosen second deacon, which office he filled acceptably almost for forty years, when, on his own motion, he was excused by the church from performing the duties pertaining to it any longer.

There is reason to believe that this ancestor of the Tilton family was an upright and godly man, and a strict observer of the ordinances of the church; that the unwritten obligations imposed by his confession of faith were conscientiously regarded and discharged.

It is well authenticated that the earliest religious instruction received by his grandchildren in catechismal teaching and in sacred song came from the lips of this devout and honored old patriarch.

Those early precepts may not have matured in open acceptance of conventional forms, or in public acknowledgments of creeds, yet the inclination of mind then formed may have been the seed that has borne the fruit of generous liberality to every church enterprise and demand, or educational purpose ever manifested on the part of his descendants. His son Jeremiah was born in 1762, probably at Hampton or Kensington, and came into town when a lad of six or eight years with his father. He grew to be an energetic man of business, identifying himself to a remarkable degree with the improvements and facilities required by a new country. He built the original Dexter House, engaged in blacksmithing when utensils of iron were more often forged at home than purchased abroad. He put in operation a grist-mill, acted as justice of the peace, was a colonel in the militia and a soldier in the Revolutionary War. He was the father of eleven children, six daughters and five sons,—all of them possessing strong points and sterling qualities of character. Samuel, the second child and son, was born in 1789.

He was a marked man, of fine presence, unusual sagacity, solid sense and self-reliance.

He possessed qualities which would have made him a foremost man in any position Providence might have assigned him. Rumrill says, "As a friend he was honest, firm and unswerving, a liberal contributor" to religious and educational interests, and, in the broadest sense of the term, a public-spirited citizen.

He married Myra, daughter of Samuel Ames, of Canterbury, in 1815, a lady of unusual excellence. She was endowed with characteristics which, to a great extent, form the ideal of a noble woman, a model wife and devoted mother.

Charles Elliott Tilton was their youngest son of a family of five children, and was born within a stone's throw of his present premises, September 14, 1827. He received the benefit of a good common-school education, and at the age of fifteen was placed under the tuition of Professor Dyer H. Sanborn, and subsequently entered a military school at Norwich, Vt., where he remained three years. The training and discipline acquired here well fitted him for the intense activity required by the business enterprises he originated and developed, or was engaged in, on the Pacific slope from 1850 to 1880, a period of thirty years.

On the declaration of the war with Mexico he was offered a captain's commission by Colonel Ransom, which he was anxious to accept, but the honor was declined on account of paternal influence.

Young Tilton, with a limited outfit, repaired to New York, and was employed by his brother Alfred, a well-known and successful merchant.

Although most favorably situated with excellent prospects of promotion, New York failed to satisfy the ambition that had grown with his youth of twenty years. He cut loose from all present and prospective advantages held out in this great commercial mart, from friends and acquaintances, and visited nearly all of the inhabited West India Islands with a view to future business. He prospected the Amazon and Orinoco Rivers to the head-waters in canoes, aided by native Indians as guides, visiting localities seldom, if ever, seen by white men.

He then proceeded on land to Caracas and La Guayra, from thence to Maracaibo, St. Matha, Cartagena, Chagres and Panama.

Having been absent from civilization for a long time, the knowledge of gold-sources in California and the thousands on the isthmus on the way to gather it, representing every tongue and condition, were stubborn facts which changed his purposes; causing a revolution in his plans which ended in the realization of his youthful dream of fortune.

His knowledge of the Spanish language was the means of attaching himself to a company of gold-hunters from Vermont, who made use of his services in the purchase of subsistence from the natives while waiting for transportation to San Francisco. For three months his party remained here; every arrival from the East added large numbers to the thousands already in Panama. A chance came at last to leave.

It was announced by the agent of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company that the steamer "Panama" would soon arrive from New York, and that in due time one hundred and fifty deck passages to San Francisco would be disposed of at one hundred and fifty dollars each.

The vast army of resolute adventurers (not less than fifteen thousand) swarming on the Isthmus demanded fair play in face of the fact that the chances were ninety-nine out of every hundred against any one individual securing the coveted ticket.

In deference to public opinion, the agent advertised that on a designated day, at nine o'clock A.M., one hundred and fifty tickets would be issued on the principle of "first come, first served."

The subject of this sketch was the solitary exception in the vast throng who alone lacked ready funds, in that no-credit period, wherewith to pay his passage.

He visited the agent, but could obtain no concession in his own behalf, and the inevitable fact confronted him that he had now reached the tightest spot in his career.

The parting words of the agent, "Boy, if you get here I'll take your draft on your brother," lifted the burden and inspired courage for the terrific struggle which began at midnight on that memorable occasion.

At twelve o'clock preceding the morning of the sale the streets of Panama were filled with a turbulent mob, each one desperate and determined on securing a passage.

For nine long hours the crazed and maddened crowd hooted and yelled, struggled and pushed, swayed and surged in front of the ticket-office. Hats, coats, vests and shirts were torn from their owners, and in many cases men denuded of all clothing were seen in this raging sea of humanity.

In ten minutes after the time appointed for sale the one hundred and fifty passages were secured. Young Tilton, stripped to his pantaloons, was recognized by the agent, and his profane salutation had a flavor of admiration in it as he passed him ticket No. 102, with "I'll take your draft, my boy."

He had intuitively recognized the unflinching pluck and innate honesty of his new acquaintance. Tickets changed hands freely at from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars each.

A young man by the name of Newhall purchased one at twelve hundred dollars, and chance or Providence (let the sequel decide) brought him and Tilton together as messmates. They pre-empted a section of the deck, and at no time during their passage did both leave it at the same time. Tilton from his limited funds bought a bag of crackers and a few pounds of cheese, which for twenty-two days made the daily fare of the two adventurers on their way to the land of gold. Six feet square of oaken plank made their domicile and dormitory, and the skies of the Pacific their only roof.

Youth and young blood were proof against such accommodations, and when San Francisco, with its piles of sand and scattered red cedar shanties, first met their view, it gave faint promise of its future opulence and magnificence.

Newhall went to the mines and shortly returned home-sick, dejected and without funds, and there were thousands similarly situated. No chance existed for working a passage to the East, and all attempts to obtain one proved failures.

There is a divinity which shapes our ends, and the divinity in Newhall's affairs was a little red flag. He was a ready talker, witty and quick at repartee. Tilton's fertile perception had grasped the possibilities as he entered the auction-room and solicited employment for an auctioneer.

An arrangement was made in less time than it takes to record it, and young Newhall was engaged for the night to sell jack-knives, needles, combs, &c., on trial.

He suited, was retained at good rates, was prudent and saved his money and soon started a similar venture for himself, which developed into an immense business, from which he retired with a fortune of two millions of dollars. His sons became his successors, and their warehouse is still found adjoining the Bank of California, on Sansome Street, the leading auction and commission house on the Pacific Coast.

Newhall never forgot the friendship that stood by him in the days of his need, or the prompting that was instrumental in his success. Identified as Mr. Tilton became with the development of the resources of our Western coast and its ever-receding frontier for thirty years, his diversified operations required the assistance of many men.

Through such agency others became successful who can trace their fortune to a beginning apparently as remote and improbable as could Newhall.

In Clarke's "Sketches of Successful New Hampshire men," it is stated that "In all this period Mr. Tilton was interested in many enterprises on the coast and frontier. Among them may be mentioned the navigation of the Columbia and Willamette Rivers.

"He was one of five who controlled what has developed into the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, with a capital of twenty-four million dollars.

"As early as 1851 he interested himself with a friend of his boyhood, W. S. Ladd, who started in business in Portland, Oregon.

"In 1860 they organized the first banking-house in that territory, under the style of Ladd & Tilton, which soon acquired a national reputation. For over twenty years it occupied a high rank among the financial institutions of the country. Under their control, whatever stress affected the world of finance, the credit of this house remained unquestioned and unimpaired. Mr. Tilton retired in 1881. Since then Mr. Ladd and his sons have fully maintained its honestly-earned repute.

"Soon afterwards the banking-house of Ladd & Bush was founded at Salem, Oregon, also the First National Bank of Portland and the First National Bank of Walla-Walla, Washington Territory, in all of which Mr. Tilton was interested.

"At the same time he was largely engaged in transportation across the plains. He fully understood the requirements of merchandise in Utah, Montana, Wyoming and Colorado. He furnished and dispatched large trains from San Francisco, Cal., to Utah, and from St. Joseph, Mo., to Colorado, and from thence to Montana, giving his personal attention to them all.

"A country largely held by hostile Indians had to be traversed, and few trains reached their destination unmolested. Desperate encounters occurred frequently, resulting in more or less loss of life and property, and once ending in the capture of the entire train.

"Other obstacles had to be met, incident to such undertakings,—like storms, swollen rivers and break-downs, which would have seemed insuperable to any one of less force of character. He purchased lands in all the Territories, which investments have proved advantageous.

"He engaged in many other transactions which his keen perceptions led him to believe would be remunerative, so that, in fact, there were but few enterprises of importance connected with the growth of the Pacific slope, whether pertaining to its finance, internal improvement, its foreign and domestic commerce, in which the cool and sagacious subject of this sketch was not a participator. To organize and direct successfully such varied and extended operations, outlined only in part, required a mind strong in perception and purpose. A union of these qualities with that adventurous spirit which led the youth of eighteen to the sources of the Orinoco and Amazon in pursuit of wealth constituted a mental plant which could well measure the possibilities of a new country and turn to advantage peculiarly its development.

"In all this time Mr. Tilton enjoyed excellent health and immunity from serious accident.

"After living amidst the malaria of tropical lagoons, sleeping by the side of his mustang on the plains, blockaded by storms among the Sierras and assailed by hostile Apaches, he returns to his native hills unscathed, with a sound constitution and his youthful purpose fully accomplished."

Since 1881 more of his time has been spent in Tilton than for many years previously, and has been occupied to a considerable extent in superintending the various improvements he has planned.

There are two conditions apparent at all times in whatever he does,—thoroughness and general utility.

He has constructed an artificial island, and on it an elegant summer-house surrounded with statuary enduring as marble and bronze, and refreshing shade, easily accessible by a solid bridge of granite and iron, all of which is the common property and of any who choose to avail themselves of its enjoyment.

Fountains as classic and permanent as ever adorned the streets of Rome are kindly tributaries to the needs of man and beast.

The grateful coolness of a shady park, with easy drives and rural seats, for many summers to come will invite the visitors' presence and return.

A town hall of brick and granite, with its recurring income, will remind posterity for generations of the large liberality which gave it form.

Generous outlays for cemetery improvements and for a driving park unexcelled in all that makes one perfect are substantialities which will remain evidences of a broad humanity which recognized the enjoyments as well as the necessities of mankind.

His liberal contributions for church and school interests are influences which may be felt "to time's remotest bound."

There are many other attractions in our village which can be traced to his direct agency.

The elegant passenger depot and its appointments, the iron bridges, and, in fact, all the public improvements of the town are indebted more or less to him for their construction.

His bounty has recognized the field of our needs, our comfort and our pleasure.

As a natural sequence, a business career as extensive and diversified as his has been requires occupation now. His various enterprises in Tilton, which are giving more than a local reputation to the town, afford rest as well as employment to a mind by nature and habit inclined to vigorous activity.

His thirty years of participation in those renewing instrumentalities which have wrested a territory as large as the original thirteen States from Indian and half-breed supremacy, and which now teems with an enlightened population possessing all the adjuncts of civilization, would furnish ample incident and adventure to fill a volume.

He quietly takes his place as one of the people among his former neighbors, asking no consideration except what inures to every well-meaning citizen.

The golden dream of his boyhood's days has come to pass, yet the memories of youth and early associations remain the most sensitive chords in his nature. Herein lies the inspiration for that munificence which has given the town bearing his family name prominence and fame abroad, and himself esteem and consideration as well.

His cordial and unpretentious bearing at all times indicate his true character. His sympathies are of and with the people. Possessing marked elements of personal popularity, thus far his record leaves no sign of the politician.

Public positions which would have tempted the ambition of almost any man have been proffered him, but declined, in obedience to a resolution formed in early life to hold no office. He has well-defined political convictions, yet his suffrage is influenced by higher motives than control the mere partisan. The character of the candidate, his record as affecting the business interests of the country, are more potent than party discipline or platforms in directing his vote.

At his elegant residence, overlooking the beautiful village which bears his name, the warmest welcome is extended and the largest hospitality dispensed to all his life-long friends and acquaintances.

What was the personal appearance of the subject of this sketch? may be asked an hundred years hence. In height, five feet ten; well and compactly formed and without surplus flesh; of erect carriage, regular features; clear blue eyes, and when young must have given promise of the fine presence and noble manhood he now possesses.

His weight is about two hundred pounds, and at fifty-seven he is a well-preserved model of a self-maid man with all his mental faculties in mature perfection.

It is needless to say that he holds the undivided regard of all his neighbors and townsmen.

That he may long live to enjoy the fruits of a remarkable business career, as bold and original as it proved successful, is the ardent wish and silent prayer of all who know him.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON TILTON.

The first ancestor of Mr. Tilton of whom there is definite information was Nathaniel (1), who settled in Sanbornton, N. H., prior to 1771. He was one of the signers of the original "Church Covenant," and was a deacon of the old church for nearly forty years. He lived a devoted Christian life and died February 11, 1814. He married Abigail Gilman (a relative of Governor Gilman), who bore him seven children, one of whom, Jeremiah (2), was born in 1762 and was in the Revolutionary War at the age of sixteen as a tender; was later a colonel in the State militia; also was a justice of the peace and an energetic business man, who did much to build up the village which later was given the name of Tilton. He built the original hotel on the site of the present Dexter House, and was proprietor of a grist-mill and a trip-hammer shop. He suffered much during the later years of his life from rheumatism. He died April 10, 1822. February 21, 1786, he married Mehitable Hayes, who bore him eleven children,— John (3), born July 16, 1787; married Eunice Jaques, died August 29, 1863. Samuel (3), born August 29, 1789; married, first, Myra Ames, January 31, 1815, and second, Mrs. Elizabeth Haven, March 6, 1858; died November 12, 1861. Sally (3), born in 1791; single; died January 31, 1818. Jeremiah, Jr. (3), born September 10, 1793; married Nancy Carter, December 9, 1816; died January 23, 1863. James P. (3), born November, 1796; married Mary G. Cross, July 16, 1820; died April 1, 1872; he was a soldier in the War of 1812. Abigail (3), born in 1798; single; died October 29, 1849. Mahala (3), born in August, 1800; married Hon. D. C. Atkinson (first wife), October 12, 1818; died June 12, 1820. Mary P. (3), born December 13, 1802; married Parson Whidden, January 31, 1832; died October 5, 1875. Alexander Hamilton (3), born December 25, 1804. Mehitable (3), born August 26, 1807; married Hon. D. C. Atkinson (second wife), September 3, 1828; died November 12, 1844. Sophronia (3), born in 1810; single; died March 12, 1845.

Alexander Hamilton, the subject of this sketch, passed his boyhood on the old Tilton place, in Sanbornton, and at "the Bridge," where his father removed. His educational advantages were such as were afforded in the common schools. Although his parents had planned that he should take a collegiate course, his own inclinations were for trade or manufacture, and at the age of sixteen he entered the woolen-mill of his brother and learned the trade of a clothier. He was an energetic young man, ready to see, and soon mastered the details of the business so readily that he was taken into partnership and so continued for several years.

After dissolving partnership with his brother he started on his own account the clothing business at Meredith village, but after several years of fair success he returned to Sanbornton Bridge and engaged in general merchandising with William Follansbee, and continued in partnership with him several years; then dissolved with him and went into partnership with Mr. Colby, in another store on the Northfield side of the river, and continued with him until the fall of 1837, when he formed a partnership with George S. Baker, and commenced the manufacture of cassimeres. He also built a woolen-mill on the site of the old Darling mill, but sold the privilege to the "Lake Company" (an association of Boston capitalists, who were buying up the control of the stream), although he continued to run the mill on a lease. He was successful here for several years. In 1855 this mill was burned. After the fire he took the old Holmes cotton-mill, changed it into a woolen-mill, and, in 1859, doubled the size of it to meet the requirements of a large business. He carried on the manufacture of woolen goods here until near the time of his death, employing part of the time as many as sixty hands. Mr. Tilton was the inventor, and for years the proprietor, of an ingeniously-woven goods, to which was given the name of "Tilton tweeds." These goods were soon in great demand, and to this day are celebrated.

Alexander H. Titton

Mr. Tilton built a fine residence on the bluff overlooking his mills (the house now owned by J. F. Taylor), but when taking the Holmes mill he removed to the Holmes mansion and lived there the remainder of his life. In politics Mr. Tilton was a Democrat—active and influential in advancing the interests and policy of his party—he became a power widely felt. He was for many years a director of the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad, was justice of the peace, and while he never made a public profession of religion, he was a liberal man and made frequent donations to the support of public worship, both in his native town, and at "the Bridge." One of his public donations was an elaborate receiving-tomb, which stands in the Park Cemetery. Mr. Tilton suffered severely in the last years of his life from chronic troubles, and died at his home August 16, 1878, respected and beloved, and as one of those whose thrift and enterprise had done so much to build up the community in which he lived, his loss is severely felt. July 27, 1837, Mr. Tilton married Abigail B. Baker, eldest daughter of Mark and Abigail Ambrose Baker, who, since his death, has carried on the business of manufacturing the "Tilton tweeds" in a highly successful manner, having associated with her Mr. Selwin B. Peabody as partner.

Mr. Tilton had three children.—Albert Baker (4), born June 9, 1845; married Abbie Gardner Day, of Boxford, Mass., August 15, 1866, and died August 25, 1879; his widow married William J. Durgin, November 27, 1873. Alfred Edwin (4), born October 17, 1846; died November 2, 1846. A. Evelyn (4), born March 2, 1854; died July 20, 1876. She was a lovely character, but early was taken to Him who gave, "While the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them."

SELWIN BANCROFT PEABODY.

The great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch was Samuel (1), who was born September 1, 1741, and lived in Andover, Mass., where most of his children were born.

He married Elizabeth Wilkins, of Amherst, and died August 6, 1814. His wife died July 18, 1836. His son, John (2), was born August 15, 1775. He was a millwright, carpenter and cabinet-maker, and lived in New Boston. He married Mary Holt, and died May 1, 1832. Of his children, John, Samuel and Sargon were farmers, Jacob a brick-maker, James and William were blacksmiths, Ezekiel and Noah hatters, and Joseph a merchant. Noah (3) was born September 4, 1810. He married Isabella Walker

Richards, December 9, 1831, and removed from Sutton, N. H., to Sanbornton Bridge in 1842, and opened a hatter's shop. He afterwards went into the mercantile business, in which he continued eighteen years, with fair success only. Desiring a change, he closed out and entered the counting-room of Alexander H. Tilton, and becoming familiar with the manufacture of goods, he took the position of finisher. Here he remained many years, and had finally the principal care of the large business of the Tilton Mills. He was a prominent member of the Congregational Church and a man of excellent standing as a citizen and a Christian. He died September 11, 1876. His children were Selwin Bancroft (4), born January 13, 1839; James Van Ness, born October 13, 1841; and Georgiana Isabel, born November 15, 1843, married David F. Cheney, formerly of Franklin, N. H., and now of Lawrence, Mass. The subject of this sketch, at the age of three years, moved to the "Bridge," and here his boyhood was passed. In addition to the advantages of the common schools of the town, he attended the Tilton Institute, where he took the full preparatory course for Dartmouth College. It was during this preparatory course that he began to look upon the medical profession as the one of his choice, and at its close he entered the office of Dr. Lyford, at the Bridge, where he remained a short time and then went to Lawrence, Mass., to study under the direction of Dr. Sayforth. To obtain the necessary means to go on with his studies, he taught school at Sanbornton Bridge, also in Northfield and at Bellaire, Ohio. At the breaking out of the Civil War he enlisted in the Fortieth Massachusetts Volunteers, and served until the close of the war, being in nearly all the engagements of his regiment, notably the siege of Suffolk, Va.; Baltimore Cross-Roads, Va.; siege of Fort Wagner, S. C.; Ten-Mile Run and Barber's Ford, Fla.; Drury's Bluff, Petersburg Heights and the siege of Petersburg, Va.; Bermuda Hundred; Fair Oaks and capture of Richmond. From his knowledge of medicine he became very efficient in the medical department of the army, and was on detached duty a portion of the time. He was in the dispensary of Jarvis General Hospital, Baltimore, in the office of provost marshal at Governor's Island, and was wounded before Petersburg. At the close of the war he entered the drug store of Burleigh Bros., in Boston, Mass., at which place he received a serious injury by falling through an open hatchway, from which injury he was a long time in recovering.

In 1869, his health not being as good as before the accident, Mr. Peabody went into Tilton's mill and learned the business in all its branches, and shortly after the death of the proprietor, in 1878, was invited to become associated with the widow of Mr. Tilton in the conduct and management of the large business left by him. Since this time Mr. Peabody has been the practical head of the firm, the business of which has been largely increased until now the full capacity of the mill, about fourteen hundred yards per day, is reached. It is at this mill that the celebrated Tilton tweeds are made. In addition to these tweeds, there are made some styles of cassimeres (introduced by Mr. Peabody), which have become staple in the general market.

In 1880, Mr. Peabody built a fine residence for himself, adjoining the Tilton mansion, on a gentle slope overlooking the mill in which he has won his large financial success.

In politics Mr. Peabody is a Democrat. He has represented the town in the General Court; has been town clerk; is a director in the National Bank and on the Board of Education, and is an attendant on public worship at the Congregational Church of Tilton.

February 7, 1867, Mr. Peabody married Elizabeth S., daughter of Darius M. and Elizabeth Richards, of New Bedford, Mass. From this union there have been three children,—Leon Bancroft (5), born December 17, 1867, died March 22, 1868; an infant daughter, born June 7, 1869; and Isabella Weston (5), born December 18, 1871.

Mr. Peabody's brother, James Van Ness (4), is a finisher in the Tilton Mills, and lives in Northfield, N. H. He married Susan Mary Rand, January 1, 1865. They have one child,—Leon Bancroft (5), born February 25, 1871.

HISTORY OF SANBORNTON.

CHAPTER I.

Geographical—Original Grant—The First Settlements—Names of Pioneers—Initial Events—Witchcraft in Sanbornton—Incorporation of the Town—Petition—The First Town-Meeting—Selection Elected—Second Town-Meeting—Third Town-Meeting.

SANBORNTON lies in the western part of the county, and is bounded as follows:

West, by Merrimack County; East, by Great Bay; South, by Tilton; North, by Meredith and New Hampton.

The township was granted by the Masonian proprietors, December 31, 1748, to John Sanborn, of Hampton, and others. The grantees were residents of Hampton, Exeter and Stratham, twelve of whom were named Sanborn; hence the name of the town. Settlements were retarded by reason of trouble with the Indians, and none were permanently made until 1764. In 1768 there were thirty-two families in town.

The first settlers were Moses Danforth, Thomas Danforth, Solomon Copp, Daniel Fifield, Samuel Shepard, John Sanborn, David Dustin and Andrew Rowen, in 1764.

It is certain from the "Proprietors' Records," as below (says Rev. Mr. Rumels, in his excellent "History of Sanbornton"), that the two Danforths, Solomon Copp, Daniel Fifield and Samuel Shepard, and, as we know from other sources, Andrew Rowen, and perhaps David Dustin (1766?), had moved to town during the season of 1764. Also that Daniel Sanborn and probably his cousin John were in town—the former as builder of the mill—early that year, but that they did not move their families till the late winter or early summer of 1766. We find the clerk of the proprietors, by order of the committee, calling a meeting March 2, 1765.

"To consider of a petition of a number of inhabitants of said town, setting forth their inability to support their families by reason of the scarcity of provisions," for which they "pray the proprietors would help them."

At the first meeting, March 18th, it was voted not to give them any help; but at a second meeting, March 27th, motives of humanity triumphed, this former vote was reconsidered, and it was then voted that

"The above 54 petitioners, namely Moses Danford, Thomas Danford, Solomon Copp, Daniel Fifield and Samuel Sheppard, shall receive of the proprietors £100 o. 4. for their help, the money to be equily divided among them."

It seems, therefore, certain that soon after the encouraging vote of February 6, 1764, and during the following season, in which Daniel Sanborn's first mill was built and destroyed, the first actual settlers, with their families, came to town. They must have passed the winter of 1764-65 in their settlements, as their petition had reached Exeter prior to March 2, 1765, and they could not have moved hither in the dead of winter. The conclusion is, that the persons above mentioned, and probably one or two others of the first settlers who were in easier circumstances, made a commencement during the spring or summer of 1764.

It was during the previous season, doubtless (1765), that the first "framed house" in town was erected by Sergeant John Sanborn, near the original Sanborn homestead, now disappearing (1880) under the ownership of Mr. Morgan, three-quarters of a mile north of Tilton village. To the one finished room of this house Mr. Sanborn repaired with his family, February, 1766, and himself, his cousin Daniel, who moved up a few days before, and three other men, with their families,—five in all,—were here domiciled the rest of the winter, the beds being turned up in the day-time and completely covering the floor at night; the cattle also being tied up in the back part of the house. It is certain, however, that the wife of Daniel Sanborn did not arrive in town till the June following, when he had put up the first part of his house at the Square (now the Thomas M. Jaques place), with material brought on his own and other men's backs, by easy stages, from his mill at the bridge, at least a portion of the way, for several days in succession! A similar experience is assigned to Edward Kelley,—backing the boards of his house, still higher up the hill, to the present "Kelley Ledge."

To this or one of the two preceding years (1764, 1765) must be referred the experience of three young men,—Satchel Clark, Jacob Smith and John Thorn,— who came from Epping, with provisions (for a few days), axes and guns, to a point just west of the present Tin Corner, in Tilton. They were there engaged in felling trees, helping each other by turns, when, on one occasion, their camp took fire from the fire of their boiling pork, near by. They were first alarmed by the report of one of the guns at a distance; a second gun was heard after they started, and the third before they reached the burning camp, to which they hastened, but not in season to save their effects. They were obliged to go to Canterbury in order to replace the provisions they had lost. This camp is said to have stood on the site of the old burying-ground, west of the late Lorenzo Smith's.

Nathaniel Burley and family settled on Calef Hill.

It is well authenticated, by tradition in this latter family, that there were "only three or four little clearings at the Square" on Burley's arrival in town, viz.: Daniel Sanborn's, as before named; his brother Aaron's, a little south (present Kimball or Joshua Lane place); Josiah Sanborn's, in the hollow east of the Square; and Edward Kelley's, on the hill above; while their nearest neighbors in other directions were John Sanborn, "this side," and Ebenezer Morrison and Benjamin Darling, "at the Bridge" (now Eleazer Davis'); Clark, Smith and Thorn, "at the Tin Corner;" the Danforths, "on the Plains;" Solomon Copp and Andrew Rowen, "near the Ferry;" and David Dustin, "at the north." The latter part of this year were added to their immediate neighborhood John Folsom upon, and Samuel Smith to the north of Calef Hill, and others in other parts of the town, as will soon appear; while the next year Major Taylor came to the Square; and the second spring (1769), William Thompson, to the present Eben Burleigh place. It is also a tradition from the Burley family that their crops were cut off, or greatly injured, these two first years in succession,—in 1767 by frost, in 1768 by hail,—but "the third year, 1769, they succeeded."

The first chaise was driven to town in 1800 by Israel Adams, and this was the only one in 1803. Prior to 1818 no more than seven others are believed to have been owned here, and these, as vividly remembered by the late Benaiah S. Crockett, were Peter Hersey's, Andrew Lovejoy's, Nathaniel Taylor's, Moses March's, Thomas Kimball's, Nathaniel Piper's and Stuart Hoyt's. As to the priority of four-wheeled vehicles, a difference of statement has appeared. It lies between the wagon made at Hampstead by David Fogg, in 1806, afterwards sold to Page Philbrook, and by him driven to town, and that introduced by Clark Gordon, the clothier on Salmon Brook. The former was more probably the first, the latter more striking and better remembered. Its body was capacious, holding ten bushels. It was painted gaudily, in large checks, and set on the axle-tree with big springs under the seat. It was popular, and was "let" continually for two or three years, paying its original cost, seventy dollars, several times over. This must have been prior to 1814, soon after which wagons began to multiply in town from the shop of Joseph W. Clement, at the Tin Corner. Their cost at first was about thirty dollars, being set on wooden axle-trees, with a hole for the tongue, and lynch-pins instead of nuts. Iron axle-trees next came into use, then leather thorough-braces, and finally elliptical springs.

The first framed barn was erected by Josiah Sanborn, in the valley of Thomas' Brook, east of the Square. The first cows in town fared hard in winter from the lack of good hay, and went farrow for three years or more. To a Mr. Pease, who came to Steele's Hill from Newmarket after 1768, and made only a short stay in town, is yet ascribed the introduction of the first improved stock into the town of Sanbornton.

Even after grist-mills were built in Sanbornton, and the settlers had ceased to bring their meal from distant towns on their backs, the Smith Brothers, one or both, on the mountain, continued to pulverize their corn on a large flat or hollowed rock, as the Indians had done before them (twitness a stone used for that purpose, as supposed, near the Esquire Clark place, in Franklin); while in the east part of the town it was still easier for certain families to boat their grists across the Great Bay to Meredith Bridge, and even across the second bay to Lake village. Mr. Elisha Smith, in particular, had an old-fashioned boat made of two large pine logs, each hollowed out on one side and mortised together. This boat would carry sixteen persons; and Mr. Smith was accustomed to cross the bay with each of his boys, who were large enough to carry a peck of grain (himself one and a half bushels) over the neck of land in Laconia, from Danforth rock, by the present county farm, to the Lake village miller's boat, on the shore of Round Bay.

There was only one person in Sanbornton who suffered from "witchcraft." The witch (says Mr. Runnels) was Mrs. Mehitable Danforth, on the Plains. He, Mr. —, was on a certain occasion bringing half a barrel of rum to town with an ox-team. Mrs. Danforth, as he alleged, wished him to stop and tap the rum at her house; and upon his declining to do so, bewitched one of his oxen. Mr. — beat the ox severely. Poor Mrs. Danforth became very lame, and was compelled to keep her bed several days. Mr. — was pursued by the Evil Spirit, and used to show prints of the cloven foot on several rocks, which were made, as he said, in the chase across the pasture near Mr. John Perkins's, and are still there to be seen! The only strange thing now appearing is that such ludicrous stories were ever "credited by so many of the inhabitants of the town," as affirmed by the annalist of the town in 1841. The truth of the matter was doubtless this: that while the said Mr. — was crossing Danforth Brook with his undesirable load, brought all the way from Concord, one of his cattle filterered; and feeling thus vexed or "plagued," he charged his difficulty upon "the witch, Hitty."

"Pursuant to the within request, the Inhabitants of said Sanbornton [being now at home] have all, except us, Benjamin Holt, severally subscribed their names herewith.

"To the Hon^d General Court, or Committee of Safety of the Colony of New Hampshire."

War of 1812.—A large majority of the citizens of Sanbornton were at first opposed to the War of 1812. On one occasion, the year before, at a "test vote" in town-meeting, it is said that only eleven in the whole town were found ready to support what were then called the Republican or war measures of the administration, which were thought to be tending towards the opening of hostilities. But after the British had perpetrated their outrages upon our seat of government, in August, 1814, and their fleets were seen hovering along the coast of New England as if meditating an attack, then the patriotic spirit of '76 was easily stirred. It seems that a mass-meeting of the citizens had been previously held, and at a second meeting, "September 21, 1814," the committee, through Nathan Taylor, chairman, reported a draft for a "military association," which was immediately signed by seventy-two individuals, as follows:

"Josiah Lane, William Weeks, Robert Steele, John Clark (3d), John Morrison, James Chapman, Samuel Dustin, Symmes Sawyer, Jona Gove, Jonathan Moore, J. B. RECRUITS IN THE VARIOUS REGIMENTS.—The following are all headed "recruits," yet accredited to the town of Sanborn. A few only resided in town. Many of them were foreigners, as shown by their names; quite a number unsoldierly in their conduct, as the word "deserted" appears after their names. It is needless here to specify such; but we give the names of all in full, with other notes. The patriotism of the town will thus be correctly measured, as these men were either hired by the town authorities on draft, or put into the service by individual citizens as their substitutes. The names are entered in the order of the State regiments.

In the Second New Hampshire Regiment was

Henry Harris, mustered in December 6, 1861; not officially accounted for.

In the Third New Hampshire Regiment were the following:

Charles Everhard, Company F, mustered in December 11, 1861, out July 29, 1865.

Congregational Church.—The first reference on the town records in relation to the support of the gospel is under date of July 13, 1767, when it was voted that "they would raise a dollar on each right, liable to pay taxes, for to hire a minister this present year," and Josiah Sanborn, Captain Joseph Hoyt and Ebenezer Sanborn were chosen a committee for that purpose. Whether a preacher was actually hired during the summer of 1767 is uncertain; but June 17, 1768, "fifty dollars" were voted "to be laid out in preaching this summer," and the first two of the former committee were chosen to carry it into effect. A similar vote was passed for each of the three following years. On the 29th of July, 1771, the proprietors began to afford more substantial aid, it being voted that ten dollars be raised on each original "right," liable to be taxed, to assist and help the inhabitants of the town in supporting a gospel minister, if they settle one among them. Three dollars of each ten were to be paid the first year, within six months after the minister is first settled, three dollars more within twelve months after the first payment, two dollars the third year, one dollar the fourth year, and one dollar the fifth year, in case the inhabitants settle one within two years from the passing of this vote, or otherwise to be of none effect. This was wisely arranged to stimulate the people to immediate effort, and aid them for a course of years, according to their disposition and ability to help themselves. The same favorable regard of the proprietors for the settlers was shown the next year, May 27, 1772, in their passing a vote to raise one dollar on each right "to help the inhabitants to build a meeting-house for the public worship of God in s'd town."

Meanwhile, the settlers had resolutely started, and, as was natural, in the direction of a house for worship first; one of the principal votes at their second annual town-meeting, 1771, being,—

"To appoint and clear a place for a meeting-house this year, to set s'd house on y^e center range line, near y^e main road (thus early desiring the inaccessable spot designated by the first surveys), to build it by y^e sale of y^e pews, and according to y^e plan drawn of y^e same; to put up y^e frame and cover it within two year from May next, and chuse a Committee to examine of [off] y^e pews and stuff for building s'd house."

The same year no tardy response was given to the liberal offer of the proprietors; for in just ten days after their vote, August 8, 1771, a special meeting of the town was called by the selectmen, at the house of Daniel Sanborn, for the sole purpose of considering proposals for settling a minister, when, after mature deliberation, and in view of the proprietors' offer (see above), it was voted,—"to give Mr. Joseph Woodman a call to settle in y^e gospel ministry in this town." His perquisites were to be as follows: First, "two hundred dollars as a yearly salary,—$180 in money and $20 in labor at money price,—the first two years, and after that $120 in money and $80 in labor yearly;" the selectmen to agree with Mr. Woodman each year "how y^e labor above voted shall be paid." Second, "Twenty cord of good fire-wood, cut into cord-wood length, to be hauled, yearly, to Mr. Woodman's door." Third, Mr. Woodman was to "receive, if he settle in y^e gospel ministry here, the value of 100 dollars in labor and stuff, for to build him a house, to be paid, so much as will set him up a house-frame, next spring, and the remainder in boards, shingle and clapboards, in y^e fall of the year following." At a subsequent meeting, October 7th, it was voted that "Mr. Woodman, if he settles in the gospel ministry in this town, shall have liberty to preach old sermons when his health will not admit of his making new ones;" also, that he "shall have liberty to be absent three Sabbaths in a year, yearly, to visit his friends." "Wednesday, the 13th of November next," was appointed "for y^e day of Mr. Woodman's ordination, should he accept the call," and it was voted to "send to y^e Churches of Canterbury, Concord, Pembroke, Epping, the first in Rowley, y^e second, third and fourth in Newbury, to assist in y^e ordination." Mr. Woodman accepted and was ordained November 13, 1771.¹

The sole objects of special meetings, December 13, and 30, 1773, was to take further measures for building and "compleating" the meeting-house. This enterprise seems to have flagged for more than two years, Mr. Woodman quietly preaching where ordained, at Daniel Sanborn's; hence the following emphatic votes:

"To build the m. h. on an entire new plan, viz., 60 feet in length by 43½ feet in width, and to build 36 pews below, as by s'd plan"; to choose a committee "to vendue off y^e pews and stuff, and to build said house as far as s'd pews will go, with y^e money that y^e proprietors of the town have and shall vote for s'd house." Also that "the meeting-house shall be raised, boarded, shingled, and y^e lower floors laid and the lower part of y^e house glassed by the 1st of November, 1774; that the house shall be finished, so far as the pew money shall go towards it, by Nov. 1, 1775;" and finally, "that all the stuff for the frame shall be brought to the meeting-house green by the last of April next, and the boards, shingles and other covering by the last of September next."

It is quite doubtful whether much assistance was afforded by the proprietors on this new plan. The former meeting-house committee appear to have proposed these dimensions to the proprietors, who rejected them in their meeting of November 17th. By the first of the above votes the town confirmed the recommendation of their committee, in opposition to the proprietors!

Meanwhile, "dark and perilous times" were approaching, so that our fathers "found it simply impossible to accomplish all they had marked out in the time specified." Tradition says they were working upon the meeting-house when the news of Bunker Hill first reached them, and that among these workmen were some who left for the scene of conflict! The annalist of 1841 says: "Mr. Woodman preached the first sermon in the meeting-house, May 21, 1775;" but it must have been in a rough, unfinished state, for in 1777 fifty dollars "of y^e money in y^e selectmen's hands" is voted "to be laid out on y^e meeting-house this year," and it was never used for town purposes till the 1st of January following; while in March, 1780, "18,000 clapboard nails and 200 squares of glass for y^e meeting-house" was the order; two years later, voted "to get thirteen thousand of clapboard nails and one hundred feet of glass; also 2,000 shingle tens and 1,000 double tens;" and June 23, 1783, the constable having warned a meeting "relative to settling some disputes that have arisen concerning some of y^e pews in the meeting-house," it was "voted to have an ally of two feet and four inches wide between y^e fore seat and y^e pews, and that there shall be a seat for children in s'd ally adjoining to s'd fore seat." Finally, September 4th, (same year), "voted to finish y^e Gallery in y^e meeting-house;" chose Captain Aaron Sanborn, Lieutenant William Chase and Ensign Elijah True "to vendue of [off] y^e pews in said gallery, and stuff for said pews, and y^e work to finish y^e same;" also "voted to build seven pews at each end of said gallery and six pews on y^e fore side, to be equally divided as to length, and to be 5½ feet wide within boards," with John Johnson, Benjamin Sanborn and Ensign Nathaniel Grant "to examine the work when done." Not till 1785 and 1786 was the definite action taken which resulted in the "finishing of y^e pulpit by y^e money raised for y^e pews," with Ensigns Elijah True and Nathaniel Grant and Lieutenant William Chase committee for the same; and not till March 31, 1789, did the town vote to lath and plaster the meeting-house, with the selectmen as committee.

In 1786 it was agreed with Mr. Woodman, according to town vote, that his wood rate should be "added to y^e $120 rate," and that the selectmen should "vendue of [off] y^e wood to y^e lowest bidder, two cord at a bid." Four new pews were ordered for the meeting-house in 1787,—two at the west end of the men's seats, lower floor, and two at the east end of the women's seats, each about six feet square. April 5, 1790, "Eld^r. James Sanborn to keep key of the meeting-house, and to sweep s'd house at one dollar per year."

Mr. Woodman was dismissed November 13, 1806, and was succeeded by Rev. Abraham Badwell, who was ordained in 1806 and remained until 1852. Rev. James Boutwell was pastor from 1852 to 1865, when he was succeeded by the present honored pastor, Rev. Moses Thurston Rannels, who was installed June 11, 1865.

Mr. Rannels is the author of the "History of Sanbornton," an elaborate work of sixteen hundred pages, published in 1882. For completeness and excellent arrangement it is unrivaled, and takes front rank among the standard local works of the day.

¹The seven individuals whose names are mentioned in the first Church covenant, in November, 1771, and who were therefore the earliest professors of religion in the town, were James Cobb, Nathaniel Tibbon, Daniel Sanborn, Benjamin Darling, Joseph Sanborn, Aaron Sanborn and Abigail Sanborn. The first confession of faith, on Oct. 10, "Jan'y 24, 1772," at which time Mr. Darling and Mr. Tibbon were chosen as the two first deacons.

First Baptist Church.—This church was organized August 12, 1792, with forty members. The first church edifice, however, was erected in 1791, and near the then residence of Deacon William Chase, now Charles B. Perley's. Lieutenant Benjamin Morgan, Deacon William Chase and Peter Hersey are said to have been "pillars and prominent actors in starting this society and building its first meeting-house;" and there were three earnest supporters of the enterprise in one neighborhood, in the south part of the town, above Tin Corner, viz.: Deacon Taylor Clark, Winthrop Durgin and Jonathan Chase. The house was not completed till the next year, and was for the first time occupied by the "Meredith Association" September, 1792. The printed "sketch" of 1833 says: "About this time" (of the erection of the house) "the brethren who had been baptized and united with the Baptist Church in Meredith were set off and constituted into a separate church, and received the name of the First Baptist Church in Sanbornton." This was on "August 12th" (probably of 1792), or just before the above-noted meeting of the "Association," though one other account puts the date of the church's formation one year later. The church then consisted of about forty members. The "society" must have been organized about the same time, as Father Crockett afterwards speaks of the "agreement between the Church and Society" and himself, entered upon in 1794.

In 1833 the meeting-house was removed one mile to the northwest of its original site, and rebuilt on its present location, near Crockett's Corner.

The following is a list of pastors:

Rev. Nicholas Folsom, of Meredith, preached half the time, 1792, and first part of the year 1793; Rev. John Crockett, ordained September 3, 1794, having preached from April, 1791, until 1813; Rev. Noah Hooper, 1813-37; Rev. Amos Bach, professor at New Hampton Institute, supply, 1817-28; Rev. Stephen Combs, 1828-41; Rev. Pascal C. Himes, 1842-45; Rev. Ichabod Huntley, 1845-47; Rev. S. S. Leighton, 1848-49; Rev. Hiram D. Dodge, 1850-54; Rev. Jeremiah D. Tilton, 1854-56; Rev. A. McClinton, 1856-57; Rev. G. A. Cooke, 1869; Rev. G. D. Ballantine, 1870-72; Rev. P. W. A. Rankin, 1872-79; Rev. Augustus A. Beckford, 1879-82; Rev. Jeremiah D. Tilton, 1882 to present time.

The Second Baptist Church was organized September 9, 1822. A meeting-house, however, had been erected at the Bay as early as 1808. This church was remodeled in 1836.

The following is a list of the pastors from 1808 to the present:

Rev. Moses Cheney, pastor of original church; Rev. William Taylor, first pastor of present church; Rev. Daniel Mattison, acting pastor in 1811 (on all, one or two years); Rev. Baptist Church in Meredith August 2, 1836, and there ordained; Rev. Benjamin Congdon, ordained May 3, 1837; Rev. Fran is E. Cleaves, October 18, 1843, dismissed October 31, 1846; Rev. Levi Waller, acting pastor 1846-47; Rev. Oliver Barron, July 30, 1847, dismissed July 6, 1851; Rev. William Norris, pastor from March, 1851, till June 1, 1852, when he died in office; Rev. John Q. A. Ware, September 3, 1853, dismissed October, 1857; Rev. H. W. Day, preached one year at more, 1857-58, enjoying an extensive revival of religion, but name not recognized as pastor on the church records; Rev. Charles Newhall, November 6, 1859, dismissed May, 1861, Rev. S. S. White, call given March, 1862, having supplied from October, 1861, dismissed April 7, 1864; Rev. A. W. Boardman, from July, 1865, till March, 1869; Rev. Gibson Smith, from August, 1866, till March, 1869; Rev. V. E. Bunker, from April, 1870, till April, 1872; Rev. H. W. Dalton, from May, 1873, till May, 1878; Rev. William Nelson Morlock, from November, 1880, to 1882; Rev. Joseph W. Merrill, 1883 to 1884.

No pastor at present.

The Third Baptist Church.—This church was organized June 20, 1833. The church edifice had been erected four years previously, in 1829, on Pine Hill, in Meredith. The building was removed to North Sanbornton, on its present location, in 1839, and completed in 1849. It has since been remodeled, and was rededicated September 10, 1876.

The following is a list of pastors:

Rev. Moses Cheney, Rev. Samuel Mattison, Rev. Herman Bayon, Rev. Stephen Combs, Rev. Oliver Barron, Rev. Daniel M. Dearborn, Rev. Valentine E. Bunker, Rev. Augustus A. Beckford and Rev. Moses P. Favore.

There is no pastor at present.

The Woodman Sanbornton Academy was incorporated June 27, 1826, with the following trustees: Hon. Nathan Taylor and Revs. Abraham Bodwell and John Crockett, of Sanbornton; Rev. William Patrick, of Canterbury; Jeremiah H. Woodman, of Rochester; Aaron Woodman, of Boston; Drs. Benaiah Sanborn and Thomas P. Hill, Jonathan Moore, Abel Kimball, Jesse Ingalls and Peter Hersey, all of Sanbornton.

The first preceptor was D. L. Nichols, in 1826, and the last, Albert P. Whittimore, in 1858.

The Sanbornton and Franklin Union Academy was erected in 1845, at the chapel. The last term of school was held in 1861. The first teacher was Hibbard Hanaford, in 1845, and the last, Calvin Brown, in 1861.

APPENDIX.

MERRIMACK COUNTY.

CONCORD.

The Free-Will Baptist Church of Concord, N. H., was organized June 23, 1857, by a council consisting of Revs. Oliver Butler, Elias Hutchings, Ebenezer Fish and Silas Curtis. The church numbered twenty-seven members. Josiah S. Ingalls was chosen clerk, and at the next meeting of the church Hosea W. Merrill and Paul Robinson were chosen deacons. For the first year from its organization the pulpit of the church was supplied by Mr. J. P. Nutting, a student at New Hampton Institute, Rev. C. E. Blake and Rev. Silas Curtis. Rev. Mr. Curtis gave the right hand of fellowship to fourteen members during this time, and nine more were added by Rev. Mr. Blake, three of whom he baptized. November 23, 1858, Rev. J. P. Nutting was ordained pastor of the church, and remained with the church until September, 1862. He resumed the pastorate after a year's absence, continuing his relation until January 1866. His successors have been as follows: Rev. A. K. Moulton, 1866-69; Rev. Silas Curtis, 1869-75; Rev. F. L. Wiley, 1875-76; Rev. H. F. Wood, 1876-82; without a pastor, 1882-83; Rev. A. T. Hillman, 1883. The whole number who have joined the church since its organization is about three hundred. Present membership, one hundred and sixty-four. The present deacons are James B. Fellows and Moses B. Smith. A flourishing Sunday-school has been maintained from the first, besides which the children are organized into a society called the "Willing Workers."

L. W. James is superintendent of the Sunday-school; Frank Heath, assistant superintendent; Hattie B. Fellows, secretary and treasurer.

The church owns an edifice free from debt, capable of seating three hundred persons; also, a vestry with seating capacity for one hundred and fifty.

The church was true to the anti-slavery position of its denomination, and takes advanced ground to-day on all social and moral questions.

Its present condition is as bright with hope as its past was marked with struggles.

First Baptist Church of Penacook was organized August 6, 1845, with the following members: William H. Allen, Chloe E. Allen, Ebenezer W. Allen, Caroline Allen, Sarah A. Burpee, David Brown, Eunice H. Brown, Henry H. Brown, Mary A. D. Brown, John S. Brown, Samuel F. Brown, Hannah M. Brown, Martha A. Brown, Philip C. Clough, Lucy Clough, Sarah E. Cull, Martha A. Crowell, Mary Dickerman, Sarah Eastman, Luke Eastman, Sarah C. Eastman, Benjamin Hoyt, Jeremiah A. Haynes, Sarah Haynes, Joseph F. Hale, Lucretia Johnson, Martha A. Perkins, Nancy Sanborn, Hiram Simpson, Mary S. Simpson, Jacob Tewksbury, Joanna Tewksbury, Rev. Edmund Worth, Maria Webster.

The new church building was erected in 1857-58, and dedicated September 8, 1858.

The present officers are: Pastor, Rev. Welcome E. Bates; Deacons, Franklin A. Abbott, Henry F. Brown, William H. Allen; Treasurer, Franklin A. Abbott; Superintendent of Sunday-School, Edmund H. Brown; Clerk, M. Quincy Bean.

Railroads. CONCORD AND CLAREMONT RAILROAD was chartered June 24, 1848; united with Central Railroad Company June 8, 1853, under title of Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers Railroad Company. The road from Concord to Bradford, twenty-seven miles, was completed July 19, 1859; the branch Contoosook River Railroad from Contoosook to Hillsborough, fourteen and one-half miles, was opened in December, 1859. On July 12, 1856, the latter was united with and sold to the Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers road. The Sugar River Railroad, an extension from Bradford to Claremont, twenty-nine miles, was chartered July 7, 1856, opened in 1872; consolidated with the Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers roads on October 31, 1874, under the existing title of the Concord and Claremont Railroad. Total mileage, seventy miles; estimated cost, $1,126,666.38. The road has never paid any stock dividend.

THE NORTHERN RAILROAD was originally chartered June 18, 1844. This charter was superseded December 27, 1841, because it contained no provision to take land. The Bristol Branch was chartered as the Franklin and Bristol Railroad July 8, 1846; consolidated with the Northern January 1, 1869. The Northern road was opened to Franklin December 28, 1846, and was operated by the Concord Railroad until the completion of the line to Grafton, on the 1st day of September, 1847. On the 17th of November following the road was opened to Lebanon, and to White River Junction in June, 1848. The Bristol Branch was opened in 1818; cost, $200,000; cost per mile, $16,000. Northern: Cost, exclusive of branch, $2,868,400; leased to Boston and Lowell for ninety-nine years at five per cent.

CONCORD RAILROAD.—This road was chartered June 27, 1835, being the second charter granted by this State. It was not until February, 1841, that the first effective steps were taken in the enterprise. During the remainder of that year the work of construction was vigorously prosecuted. The rails were all bought abroad, and it was one of the incidents of the year that a brig with a cargo of four hundred tons of rails for this road was lost at sea. The Concord road was opened to Manchester July 4, 1842, and to Concord September 1st of the same year. A second track was laid in 1846-48. The total capital expended was one million five hundred thousand dollars. Since its opening, in 1842, the road has paid a dividend of ten per cent. for twenty-four years, and a dividend ranging from six to nine per cent. during the remaining nineteen years. Since 1868 ten per cent. dividends have been regularly declared. The financial prosperity of this road has few, if any, parallels in the country. This has been due, in the main, to its small cost of construction, $40,506.62 per mile; to its low grades, the maximum being but fifteen feet to the mile; and to its steadily-expanding local business, as well as the extensive traffic that has fallen to it by the development of the roads to the north and west.

CONCORD AND PORTSMOUTH RAILROAD.—The origin of this road was a charter granted July 1, 1845, to the Portsmouth, Newmarket and Concord Railroad, which was united with the Portsmouth, Newmarket and Exeter Railroad the same year. The charter expired in 1850, when the time was extended three years, and the present name adopted. The road was built in 1851-52. After passing through several years of financial embarrassment, the road, on the 1st of June, 1855, went into the hands of the trustees of the mortgage bond-holders. On September 1, 1857, the franchise was sold, in accordance with a special act of the Legislature, the capital being limited by the new company to $250,000. On the 11th of September, 1858, the road was leased to the Concord Railroad for five years at an annual rental of $15,000 and $2500 additional, to be laid out in improvements.

In 1861 a new lease for ninety-nine years was made to the Concord road, the rental being increased to $24,500 and $500 for expenses of organization. The capital stock is now $350,000, and the rental equivalent to seven per cent. The coal traffic of this road has become the most extensive in the State, and alone affords a handsome revenue to the lessee above the rental. The importance of this road to the coal supply of the great manufacturing interests of Southern and Central New Hampshire cannot be overestimated.

THE MANCHESTER AND NORTH WEARE RAILROAD was chartered June 24, 1848, as the New Hampshire Central Railroad Corporation. The line as built extended between Manchester and Henniker, a distance of twenty-five miles, where it intersected the Contoocook River Railroad. The road was opened to Oil-Mill village February 19, 1850, and to Henniker December 10, 1850. Its cost was $546,587.49. It was rechartered in 1858, and the incorporators authorized to select their own name, when the present one was chosen. The property was purchased at a trustees' sale in 1859 for the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, and has since been owned and operated by the Concord road. Six miles of the track, between Henniker and North Weare, were torn up on Sunday, October 31, 1858, by Joseph A. Gilmore, superintendent of the Concord road. The accounts are merged in those of the Concord road, though a nominal organization is maintained.

SUNCOOK VALLEY RAILROAD.—The first charter, which lapsed, was granted January 4, 1849; second charter was granted July 1, 1863. Built in 1868 and 1869; road opened in the latter year. The road cost $454,700. On the 1st of January, 1870, the road was leased to the Concord and Manchester and Lawrence Railroad corporations for the term of forty-two years, at an annual rental of $14,400 and $300 additional for the yearly expenses of organization. In the construction of the road gratuities were contributed to the amount of $109,700, as follows: Manchester, $50,000; Pittsfield, $31,000; Epsom, $17,700; Pittsfield Manufacturing Company, $3000; individuals, $8000. The total cost of the road, including gratuities, was $454,070. Cost per mile, $20,046. Of the original 3451 shares, 1051 were taken by the Concord and Manchester and Lawrence corporations, leaving 2400 upon which interest is paid at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

THE MANCHESTER AND LAWRENCE RAILROAD was chartered June 30, 1847, from Salem, this State, to Manchester connecting with Concord Railroad. The road was opened to Manchester November 13, 1849. The Methuen Branch was chartered by Massachusetts in 1846, and is owned by the Boston and Maine Railroad, by which it is kept in repair. The branch is operated by the Manchester and Lawrence, for which an annual rental of ten thousand dollars is paid. The cost of the Manchester and Lawrence road was one million dollars. After several years of ineffectual operation the road was leased to the Concord Railroad, in 1856, for five years, and in 1861 the lease was extended for twenty years. The last year that the Manchester and Lawrence was operated independently a dividend of three per cent. was declared, while seven per cent. was earned. The twenty-year contract was broken in 1867 by a decision of the court that it was illegal. The road passed into the hands of a receiver, but has been operated for the directors by the Concord road, which pays ten per cent. upon the cost of one million dollars. Cost per mile, $44,662.79.

Line of Road.—Nashua to Concord, 31.53 miles, double track. Branch: Hooksett to Suncook, 2.5 miles. Leased: Concord and Portsmouth road, 39.5 miles; Suncook Valley road, 20 miles; Nashua, Acton and Boston road, 20.21 miles, of which 5.75 miles are in New Hampshire. The entire road is operated by the Boston and Lowell Railroad. The Concord road owns and operates the Manchester and North Weare Railroad, 19 miles, and in effect operates the Manchester and Lawrence Railroad, 22.39 miles, to the Massachusetts line. Entire line owned and operated, 159.13 miles.

THE BOSTON, CONCORD AND MONTREAL RAILROAD was chartered December 27, 1844, in which year construction was begun. Opened to Sanbornton Bridge (now Tilton) May 22, 1848; to Meredith Bridge (now Laconia) August 8, 1848; to Lake village October 1, 1848; to Meredith village March 19, 1849; to Plymouth January 21, 1850; to Warren June, 1851; to Wells River May 19, 1853. The White Mountains Railroad, an extension northward of the main line, was chartered December 24, 1848; opened to Littleton in August, 1853; to Lancaster in November, 1870; to Northumberland in August, 1872; to Fabyan's in July, 1874; to base of Mount Washington July 6, 1876. The White Mountains road was consolidated with the Boston, Concord and Montreal in 1873, the owners of the former receiving $300,000 in six per cent. consolidated bonds for their property. The cost of the line from Concord to Woodsville was $2,850,000. No dividends have been paid on the old common stock, amounting to $459,600. The preferred stock, amounting to $800,000, has paid six per cent. dividends since 1867. The bonded indebtedness of the road originally incurred, and covering the construction of the extensions and branches, amounts to $3,069,600. Leased to Boston and Lowell road June 1, 1884, at six per cent. on preferred stock, and five per cent. thereafter for the term of ninety-nine years.

Free-Masonry in Concord¹.—GRAND LODGE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.—Free-Masonry was first established in New England in 1733. In that year the Right Honorable Anthony Lord Viscount Montague, Grand Master of Masons in England, appointed

Henry Price Provincial Grand Master of New England, and on July 30th a Grand Lodge was organized at Boston.

At the celebration of the Festival of St. John the Evangelist by the Grand Lodge, June 21, 1734, a petition from the Free-Masons resident in Portsmouth, N. H., for the erection of a lodge there, was granted.

Upon the appointment, in 1736, of Robert Tomlinson to be Grand Master of North America, in place of Henry Price, resigned, by the Right Honorable John, Earl of London, Grand Master of England, a charter was issued and the lodge duly constituted. This was the first lodge of Free-Masons in New Hampshire.

During the years 1780 to 1788 several lodges were chartered in New Hampshire by the Grand Lodge in Massachusetts.

The Grand Lodge of New Hampshire was organized by deputies from the lodges in State, at Portsmouth, July 8, 1789, and General John Sullivan, President of the State of New Hampshire, was elected Grand Master of Masons in New Hampshire. With the exception of the year 1791, in which no record can be found, the Grand Lodge held quarterly meetings regularly, every year, until 1811, when annual meetings were established in place of quarterly, which have been held regularly since, and the transactions have been printed annually since 1816.

In the following list of Grand Masters will be found the names of men who have been prominent in both State and national affairs:

There are now seventy-six lodges, having eight thousand one hundred and forty-four members.

The following is a list of Grand Masters:

John Sullivan, Ball Jackson, Nathaniel Adams, Thomas Thompson, Clement Starbuck, Edward J. Long, William B. Woodward, John Harris, Joshua Barber, Samuel Farkun, James F. Dana, Henry Hubbard, James Wilson, Jr., Artemus Rogers, Charles Gilman, Jesse Carr, Ware Tappan, Isaac Hunt, Jr., Robert Smith, Thomas Rundlett, Cyrus Cross, John Christie, Hiram C. THE GRAND ENCAMPMENT OF KNIGHTS-TEMPLAR OF THE STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE was formed at Concord, June 13, 1826, by a convention of delegates from the several encampments in the State, under a warrant from Henry Fowle, Deputy General Grand Master of the General Grand Encampment of the United States, with the following organization:

John Harris, Hopkinton, Grand Master; James F. Dana, Hanover, Deputy Grand Master; Joseph W. White, Portsmouth, Grand Generalissimo; Timothy Kenrick, Lebanon, Grand Captain-General; Rev. Jonathan Nye, Claremont, Grand Prelate; Samuel Cushman, Portsmouth, Grand Senior Warden; Harrison G. Harris, Warner, Grand Junior Warden; Calvin Benton, Lebanon, Grand Treasurer; Thomas Hale, Portsmouth, Grand Recorder; Alpheus Baker, Lebanon, Grand Warbler; Jacob Silver, Hopkinton, Grand Standard-Bearer; Jacob Carter, Hanover, Grand Sword-Bearer.

There were three encampments,—De Witt Clinton, at Portsmouth; Trinity, at Hanover; and Mount Horeb, at Hopkinton.

The Grand Encampment continued to hold its annual meetings regularly, without adding to the number of its subordinates, until June, 14, 1837, which is the date of the last record. About this time, when strong anti-Masonic excitement was raging, threatening to destroy every vestige of Free-Masonry throughout the land, many ardent friends of the order became discouraged, and some of the lodges, chapters, councils and encampments ceased to keep up their organization—some from want of patronage, others from fear and more from a sense of prudence and sound discretion.

As the persecution abated and the public mind became more tranquil, Free-Masonry began to revive and flourish with new life. Dormant lodges were re-constituted, new lodges organized and the numbers increased to a degree heretofore unknown in the history of the fraternity.

Capitular, Cryptic and Templar Masonry, as well as Symbolic, received a new impulse. Two of the encampments which had long lain dormant—Trinity, at Hanover, reorganized and removed to Manchester; Mount Horeb, at Hopkinton, reorganized and removed to Concord—two new commanderies were instituted—North Star, at Lancaster, and St. Paul, at Dover; all giving promise of future prosperity and usefulness.

By a revision of the constitution of the General Grand Encampment, in 1856, the name was changed to that of "Grand Encampment of the United States." State Grand Bodies were styled "Grand Commanderies," and their subordinates "Commanderies."

A convention of delegates of the several commanderies in the State was held at Concord, June 12, 1860, and the Grand Commandery of the State of New Hampshire was formed. Under the authority of a warrant from Benjamin Brown French, Grand Master, the organization was perfected and the officers installed by the Grand Master, August 22, 1860.

Daniel Babh, Manchester, Grand Commander; Edward H. Rollins, Concord, Deputy Grand Commander; Albert R. Hatch, Portsmouth, Grand Generalissimo; Jared J. Williams, Lancaster, Grand Captain-General; Thomas G. Salter, Dover, Grand Prelate; Josiah Stevens, Jr., Concord, Grand Senior Warden; John S. Kidder, Manchester, Grand Junior Warden; John Knowlton, Portsmouth, Grand Treasurer; Horace Chase, Hopkinton, Grand Recorder; Richard N. Ross, Dover, Grand Standard-Bearer; Henry O. Kent, Lancaster, Grand Sword-Bearer; Thomas Snow, Somersworth, Grand Warbler; Lyman A. Walker, Concord, Grand Captain of the Guard.

Since the organization of the Grand Commandery four commanderies have been instituted, viz.: Sullivan, at Claremont; Hugh de Payens, at Keene; St. George, at Nashua; and St. Girard, at Littleton—making nine commanderies, with a membership of one thousand two hundred and fifty-five.

The present officers are,—

MOUNT HOREB COMMANDERY, KNIGHTS-TEMPLAR.—Henry Fowle, Deputy Grand Master of the General Grand Encampment of the United States, granted a charter dated May 1, 1826, to Mount Horeb Encampment, Knights Templar, to be located at Hopkinton, N. H., and in the same month he visited Hopkinton, where he constituted and dedicated the encampment and installed its officers. The first complete list of officers were,—

John Harris, Commander; Harrison G. Harris, Generalissimo; Enoch Darling, Captain-General; Rev. Moses B. Chase, Prelate; Daniel C. Gould, Senior Warden; Nathan Davis, Junior Warden; William Little, Treasurer; Horace Chase, Recorder; Herman Davis, Standard-Bearer; Daniel Chase, Sword-Bearer; Jacob Silver, Warbler.

The encampment continued for several years, receiving but few additions to its numbers, until the times of anti-Masonic excitement, when it gradually declined and eventually ceased to meet altogether. It remained dormant until the year 1859, when a number of the members, still residing in the vicinity, together with several Knights Templar residing in the adjoining city of Concord, presented a petition to the Grand Master of the Grand Encampment for a revival of the charter and the removal of the encampment to Concord.

The request was granted, the original charter was properly endorsed and returned to the commandery (the title having been changed to commandery by a revision of the constitution), the commandery was reorganized, and on the 21st of November, 1859, the following officers were installed:

Edward H. Rollins, Commander; Benben G. Wyman, Generalissimo; Lyman A. Walker, Captain-General; Charles W. Harvey, Prelate; Jelish Stevens, Jr., Senior Warden; Abel Hutchins, Junior Warden; Jeremiah F. Dunnell, Treasurer; Horace Chase, Recorder; James L. Peabody, Standard-Bearer; Titus A. Woodworth, Sword-Bearer; William H. Wymann, Warder.

The commandery has prospered to an extent that could have hardly been anticipated at the time of its reorganization, gradually but steadily growing until it has taken a high position among the commanderies of the State.

It numbers among its members men of deservedly high rank in every profession, who have evinced a lively interest in its affairs, and who have been ready to give of their time and means for the advancement of its interests.

The following have served as Commanders:

Edward H. Rollins, Lyman A. Walker, John H. George, Josiah Stevens, Jr., George P. Cleaves, Abel Hutchins, Samuel F. Merrill, Edward Dow, John Francis Webster, Joseph W. Hildreth, Charles N. Towle, Frank D. Woodbury, Charles C. Danforth.

The officers are,—

Thomas A. Pillsbury, Commander; Rev. Daniel C. Roberts, Generalissimo; Frank L. Sanders, Captain-General; Edward Dow, Prelate; Waldo A. Russell, Senior Warden; Charles F. Batchelder, Junior Warden; Stillman Humphrey, Treasurer; Edgar H. Woodman, Recorder; George O. Dreckerman, Standard-Bearer; James C. Badger, Sword-Bearer; Will J. Green, Warder.

HORACE CHASE COUNCIL.—Charter granted by Grand Council to Lyman A. Walker, Charles H. Woods, Abel Hutchins, William W. Taylor, Luther W. Nichols, Jr., Edward P. Colby, Reuben G. Wymann, Gust. Sargent and Joseph W. Robinson.

The following were the first officers, June 11, 1862:

Charles H. Wood, T. E. Master; Lyman A. Walker, R. I. Master; Luther W. Nichols, I. Master; Abel Hutchins, Treasurer; Gust. Sargent, Recorder; Josiah Stevens, C. of G.; Joseph W. Robinson, C. of C.; William W. Taylor, Marshal; Reuben G. Wymann, Steward.

The following have been Masters:

Charles H. Wood, Luther W. Nichols, Jr., John A. Harris, Thomas J. Sanborn, Edward Dow, Charles N. Towle, Frank D. Woodbury, R. O. Wright, John Francis Webster, George P. Cleaves, Waldo A. Russell, James C. Badger.

The following are the present officers:

James C. Badger, T. E. Master; Frank G. Edgerly, Deputy Master; Charles C. Danforth, P. C. of the Work; Stillman Humphrey, Treasurer; Frank P. Mace, Recorder; J. Frank Webster, C. of G.; Frank L. Sanders, Conductor; John W. Straw, Marshal; Edgar H. Woodman, Steward; George P. Cleaves, Chaplain; Samuel W. Emerson, Sentinel.

GRAND ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.—Royal Arch Chapters were chartered in New Hampshire by the General Grand Chapter of the United States, as follows: St. Andrew's Chapter, at Hanover (now at Lebanon), January 27, 1807; Trinity Chapter, at Hopkinton (now at Concord), February 10, 1807; Washington Chapter, at Portsmouth, November, 1815; Cheshire Chapter, at Keene, May 4, 1816.

A convention of the officers of the several chapters was held at Hopkinton June 11, 1818, and a committee appointed to obtain the consent of the General Grand Chapter for the formation of a Grand Chapter, and the convention adjourned to meet at Concord on the 10th day of June, 1819, at which time a Grand Chapter was organized, regulations adopted and the following officers elected and installed:

John Harris, G. H. P.; Thomas S. Bowles, D. G. H. P.; Henry Hutchins, G. K.; Broughton White, G. Scribe; J. Davenport, G. T.; Thomas W. Colby, G. Sec.; Rev. Thomas Beale, G. C.; Timothy Kenrick, G. M.; Abbe Cady, Alpheus Baker, Charles A. Saxton, Andrew Pierce, G. S.; Jesse Corbett, G. T.

Since 1819 annual meetings have been held regularly and the proceedings printed. The Grand Chapter suffered more, perhaps, during the excitement of the anti-Masonic times than did the Grand Lodge. But the Royal Arch Masons of those days were not to be easily discouraged.

The Grand High Priests have been as follows:

John Harris, Thomas S. Bowles, Jonathan Nye, Thomas W. Colby, Samuel Cushman, Frederick A. Sumner, Andrew Pierce, Robert Smith, Brackett L. Greenough, Wears Tappan, Daniel Chase, David Parker, Philemon Tolles, John Knowlton, Daniel Balch, John J. Prentice, Albert R. Hatch, John Christie, Theodore T. Abbott, Moses Paul, Jonas Livingston, Samuel W. Wilcox, Edward W. Harrington, John R. Holbrook, Thomas E. Hatch, Nathaniel W. Cummet, Daniel R. Marshall, John A. Harris, Edward Gustine, William Barrett, John D. Patterson, Andrew J. Thompson, John J. Bell, George W. Currier, Albert S. Wait, Charles S. Towle, Alpheus W. Baker.

There are twenty-one chapters, with two thousand four hundred and fifty members. The present officers are as follows:

Alpheus Wooster Baker, Lebanon, G. H. P.; John Francis Webster, Concord, D. G. H. P.; John Colin Neal, Franklin Falls, G. K.; Harlan Page Goodrich, Lebanon, G. Scribe; J. Wyman Hildreth, Manchester, G. T.; George Parley Cheaves, Concord, G. Sec.; Joseph Kidder, Manchester, G. C.; Nathan Parker Hunt, Manchester, G. C. of H.; Henry A. Marsh, Nashua, G. P. S.; Horace A. Brown, Concord, G. R. A. C.; William H. W. Hinds, Milford, G. M. of 3d V.; William F. Knight, Laconia, G. M. of 2d V.; George P. Kimball, Nashua, G. M. of 1st V.; John H. Steele, Peterborough, George E. Beacham, Great Falls, G. S.; Samuel W. Emerson, Concord, G. T.

TYRIAN COUNCIL OF ROYAL MASTERS (the first in New England) was established at Hopkinton, N. H., in 1815, and was afterwards united with a council of Select Masters established in that town. Subsequently other councils of Royal and Select Masters were established at Portsmouth, Hanover and Claremont. These councils organized a Grand Council in 1823. The Grand Council organized councils in Keene, Sanbornton and Dover. Of the above-named councils, but two are now in existence,—Orphan Council, at Dover, and Columbian Council, at Claremont.

The Grand Council was formed at Keene, July 9, 1823. No record of the Grand Body has been preserved. The list of Grand Officers, as published in the New Hampshire Patriot of July 21, 1823, is as follows:

Jonathan Nye, G. M.; Thomas S. Bowles, D. G. M.; Godfrey Stevens, G. P. C. of W.; Abbe Cady, G. T.; James Wilson, Jr., G. R.; Sebastian Streeter, G. C.; Charles Abbott, G. C. of G.; Annis B. Young, G. S.; Samuel P. Brown, G. Sent.

This Grand Council was in existence in 1832; whether any later, is not known to the writer. The present Grand Council of New Hampshire was formed at Concord June 11, 1862, by the then existing councils,—Orphan Council, at Dover, Columbian Council, at Claremont, and Adoniram Council, at Manchester; the two former mentioned above and the latter organized in 1856, by authority from the Grand Council of Connecticut. The officers first elected were as follows:

Daniel Balch, G. M.; Charles A. Tufts, D. G. M.; Lewis Woodman, G. C.; Moses O. Pearson, G. Chap.; Richard N. Ross, G. T.; Samuel M. Wilcox, G. R.; John B. Fisk, G. C. of G.; Philemon Tolles, G. S.; Charles H. Woods, G. Sent.

There are now nine councils, with eight hundred and ninety-eight members.

The following have served as Grand Masters:

Daniel Balch, Charles A. Tufts, John R. Holbrook, Thomas J. Sanborn, George H. True, John A. Harris, Oliver C. Fisher, Andrew J. Thompson, Henry P. Giddien, Harvey I. Currier, Frank D. Woodbury, Edward H. Currier, Reuss-lar O. Wright, George P. Cheaves, John Gillis.

The present officers are as follows:

Elliott Bernard Dodge, Plymouth, G. M.; Waldo Adolphus Russell, Concord, D. M.; Joshua Wright Hunt, Nashua, G. P. C. of W.; Joseph

W. Hildreth, Manchester, G. T.; George P. Cleaves, Concord, G. R.; Charles J. Darrah, Manchester, G. C. of G.; George H. Everett, Laconia, G. C. of C.; Rev. Josiah L. Seward, Keene, G. C.; Edward F. Houghton, Claremont, G. M.; James C. Badger, Concord, G. S.; Samuel W. Linscott, Concord, G. Sent.

EPSOM.

Census.—By the census of 1773 Epsom had eighty unmarried men from sixteen to sixty years of age, fifty-three married men of that age, eighty-six boys under sixteen years of age, and one man sixty years old or more; one hundred and nine unmarried women, fifty-three married women, four widows and two slaves.

"Agreeable to a requisition from the Genl Assembly for making out & returning to the Genl Court an exact No. of all polls of Twenty-one years & upwards, paying for Themselves a poll Tax, We have Accordingly Numbered Those belonging to the Town of Epsom, which Number Amounts to Ninety-Nine.

The Gray Family.—Another family that was prominent in town for many years, but leaves no male descendant bearing their name, was that of Captain James Gray.

Mr. Gray was born in Newburyport, Mass., October 8, 1749. He came to Epsom when nineteen years of age and was employed by the town to teach school.

In July, 1769, he married Jane Wallace, who lived but a few years.

At the breaking out of the war Mr. Gray at once joined the American forces and received a captain's commission in the First New Hampshire Regiment.

As will be seen by the accompanying papers, he was appointed an ensign officer by Colonel Marshall, of Boston, and did valiant service at Ticonderoga.

He married, for a second wife, Susannah Parsons, of Newbury, Mass., daughter of Rev. Moses Parsons and sister to Judge Theophilus Parsons. About 1778 they moved to Epsom, bringing into town the first chaise ever owned in that place.

They lived for several years in the house of the widow of Rev. John Tucke, the first settled minister in town, which we understand to have been where George W. Bacheelder now lives. They then moved on to Sanborn's Hill, and owned and occupied the farm now owned by Samuel Quimby. Afterwards they bought on the turnpike, on what has ever since been known as "Gray's Hill."

He had a grist-mill on the Little Suncook River, near where the mill of Horace Bickford now stands. He was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1788, and was also town clerk, selectman and representative.

His appointment or commission as coroner for the county of Rockingham, dated December 25, 1784, signed by Meshech Weare, President of the State, is still in a good state of preservation, in the hands of his daughter, Mrs. Susan M. G. Perkins.

He was teacher of vocal music and for several years was church chorister.

The mother of Mr. Gray was with him when he first came to town, and she was employed as a school-teacher.

Moses Parsons Gray, the oldest son of James and Susannah Gray, was born in Epsom June 29, 1779. When quite a small boy he went to Byfield, Mass., to live with his Grandmother Parsons, with whom he moved to Boston and attended school there. At the age of fifteen years he became a clerk in a store for a short time, but soon entered his uncle's employ as a sailor, that he might learn the art of navigation. When he became of age, he took command of the ship "Diana" and made several voyages to the West Indies and other foreign ports, having, while following the sea, visited Spain, Portugal and Russia.

When about thirty years of age he returned to Epsom, where he resided until his death, which occurred November 8, 1858. After coming to Epsom he taught school in the Cilley District and also in the Centre District.

While in Boston, after he had left school, he employed his spare moments in the study of surveying, which art he was very frequently called upon to practice while in Epsom, there being hardly a division line in the town but what he was acquainted with, and he was often called to other towns in the capacity of a surveyor. A plan of the town drawn by him is now in the possession of the town.

Although he never studied law, yet his reading and his intercourse with his uncle, Chief Justice Parsons, made him familiar with much that pertained to the profession, so that he was often called upon to assist in the settlement of disputes.

While he was hardly ever elected to any office by the town, yet he very frequently assisted those who were elected, and his peculiar handwriting can be found in several places upon the records.

Theodore Parsons Gray, born August 8, 1784, followed the sea, and was killed by falling from aloft to the main-deck, September 29, 1796, and was buried in "that vast cemetery where there are no monuments."

Katharine L. Gray, born February 19, 1789, married Dr. John Proctor, and lived in Epsom, where he died in June, 1847. She died in Georgetown, Mass., March, 1844. They left no children.

Lucy A. Gray, born May 5, 1785, married William Brown and lived in Epsom, where she died May 11, 1875, leaving one son and two daughters, one of whom, Mrs. Susan E. P. Forbes, has recently purchased "Fatherland Farm," the old Parsons homestead, at Byfield, Mass., where she spends her summers.

James H. Gray, born June 29, 1787, was also a sailor, and died when but twenty-three years of age, upon an island off the coast of Florida.

Judith Parsons Gray, born March 12, 1789, married John Rand, of Epsom.

Of the eight children born to them, only one has died,—James G., who died December, 1850.

The following found among the well preserved papers of the late Captain James Gray, we deem of sufficient interest to be given a place in the history of Epsom:

Letter from Captain Gray to his wife.

"CHARLESTOWN (No. 4), May 18th, 1777.

"My Dear Susie As I would not, if possible, let any opportunity of writing to you pass unimproved, therefore I embrace the present by the post to Exeter, viz., Mr. Waldo. I arrived here last Tuesday night, as you will find by my Journal, transmitted to your Father, but it was attended with some difficulty, the roads being so excessively muddy and my horse taken sick that I was obliged to walk a considerable part of the way, but at present am very well. I expect on Tuesday next to take my departure for Ticonderoga, to put my baggage upon my horse & travel through the woods, which journey is eighty miles from here. When I left Exeter I forgot my Coffee pot and thought not of it until I got to Keene, so that I am now at a loss how to make use of my coffee. Since I came here I have heard from my Brother, by Mr. Tucker, who I find him about a fortnight since in good health and high spirits. Capt. McClary has been very ill here, but has marched since through the woods.

"My Love and duty to the family. The reason of my putting my baggage upon my horse of going on foot is because the wagon cannot go through the woods."

Letter from Captain James Gray to his father-in-law, the original being in the possession of his granddaught, Mrs. A. W. Perkins, of Chester.

"TICONDEROGA, June 26, 1777.

"Hon. Sir—The last letter which I sent you by Col. Little I hope came safe to hand. I have now the pleasure, by Dr. Gomer, of Exeter, to write a second. The Wednesday after the date of my first I set off from No. 4 for Ticonderoga. Our wagon not being able to carry our baggage through the woods, I was obliged to load mine upon my horse and venture my body upon my legs through to my Journey's end, which, perhaps, may be said to be no small toilsome. However, after a toilsome Journey, I arrived at Ticonderoga, distance from No. 4, twenty miles, the 28th of May. Nothing worthy of observation has occurred to me since I came into Camp until the 17th instant, at which time the Camp at Ticonderoga was alarmed by the report of small arms at about half a mile distant from the Line, in the woods, which proved to be a party of Indians, about thirty in number, which lay in ambush for us and had then fired upon some of our men as they were returning from duty into Camp, three of which were killed and one carried off by the Savages, upon which a scouting-party was immediately sent in pursuit of them; but so unfortunate was their retreat that we could not overtake them; but in their hurry to Crown Point they were met by a party of Rangers, eleven in number, who readily gave them fire. The Indians returned the same, upon which three or four rounds were exchanged, when the Commander of the party of Rangers, Lieut. Little, received a wound in the arm & was obliged to retreat with the loss of three men. The next day a scouting-party came upon the same grounds, where they found one Indian dead and took another who could not keep up with his party; him they brought into Camp and now have him confined.

"Sir: If I am not mistaken, I would observe that those four men who were killed and taken belonged to one Company and one mess, and the fifth, who was the only one left of the mess, was the next day standing with his gun loaded in his hands, leaning his chin upon the muzzle of his gun, when it went off, as he was talking with his Brother, and drove the whole charge through his head, shelling his brains through the side of the house by which they were standing.

"I have just received news from Ticonderoga that the British Troops are landed at Crown Point, this I believe to be depended upon as a fact, so that we are now preparing for Battle.

"Gen. St. Clair has the Command of the Troops in this department. We have in our duty about 3000 men and about 1000 unfit for duty, by reason of disorders that are incident to Camp life.

"The 18th I was ordered, with my Company, to take command of this post, where we are to keep Garrison within the stockade. How long we shall remain here I can't say. I will endeavor to write again by the post who goes and comes through this Garrison.

"A letter, sir, would be very acceptable.

"My Duty and respect to all.

"Your Son,

"JAMES GRAY.

"REV. MESSRS. PARSONS, Newbury Falls.

"To be left at Mr. Davenport's Tavern."

Upon the back of an old document, headed "Return of the 3d New Hampshire Regiment of Foot, in the service of the United States, commanded by Col. Alexander Scannel, Ticonderoga, June 28, 1777," in which Captains Gray and McClary, of this town, were reported as on duty, the former with thirty-nine men and the latter with forty-nine, is found the following in Captain Gray's beautiful writing:

"Sunday, 6th July, 1777.—Retreated from Shoeborn's & lost all my money, Baggage, &c. Lodged in the woods at Night.

"Monday, 7th.—Got into Fort Ann at 6 in y^e morning; everything in the utmost confusion; nothing to eat. At 11 o'clock A.M. was ordered to take the Command of a party upon a scout and marched with 50 men besides 17 Rangers; had not marched from Garrison into the woods more than half a mile, after detaching my front, Rear and flanking Guards, when we met with a party of Regulars and gave them fire, which was returned by the enemy, who then gave back. I then pursued them with close fire till they betook themselves to the top of a mountain. At the foot of this mountain we posted our selves and continued our fire until 6 P.M., when a reinforcement of 150 more joined me; but night approaching obliged me to return with my party to Garrison, after finding one of my party killed and 3 wounded, and three of the enemy killed by our first fire.

"Tuesday Morning, 8th.—Myself, with Capt. Hutchins, with the same number of men, marched to the aforesaid mountain and attacked the enemy very warily. The engagement lasted about 2 hours, at which time the Commander of y^e Garrison sent Colo. Bansleur with a small party of militia to reinforce us. We then advanced & fired up the hill, where we found the enemy's surgeon dressing a Capt. Leg. Those, with two of their wounded soldiers, we took and sent in, and a number of our own people, men & women, who were the day before cut off by the enemy, we took. At last, finding our ammunition gone and none to be had in Garrison, ordered off my wounded and some of the dead, and formed a retreat. Much fatigued when I returned and found no refreshments, neither meat or drink; immediately a Council was called and the prisoners who were retaken brot upon examination, who gave information that an express just arrived before we made this second attack and gave the enemy intelligence that a reinforcement of 2000, with Indians, were near at hand to join them; at which time they were to make a general attack upon us. It was then determined upon to retreat to Fort Edward, after setting fire to the Garrison. A cordially, the wounded were sent off, except one, who was one of my own Company; him the surgeon did proper not to order off, that he would soon expire, or that if he was likely to live, the enemy, when they took possession, would take care of him. This I knew not of till we were ordered to march, at which time I turned back alone my Company being gone to the rear of the Army, where I found him. I then picked up a tent & fastened it between two poles, laid him upon it, and hired four soldiers to carry him. I took then four guns with my own and carried them to Fort Edward; this was about 4 o'clock P.M.; rained very hard; distance from Fort Ann to Fort Edward, 14 miles; arrived at Fort Edward at 10 in the Evening; no Barracks nor Tents to go into; therefore laid down in the rain and slept upon the ground, the fatigue of this day I believe I shall always remember.

"Col. Bansleur, wounded, Cap. Wear, wounded; Ensign Walcutt, killed; Isaac Davis, a sergeant in my Company, killed. Our loss in the two skirmishes about 15, the Enemy's unknown.

"Wednesday, 9th.—I found my self very much indisposed, having no cloths to stuff myself with & nothing to eat or drink, but walking about to make myself warm. I on parade met Capt. Peters, a Dutchman, a gentleman I never had seen but once before; he seeing me in my help-less situation took me to his tent, gave me a drink, then ordered some warm breakfast for me. Here I refreshed. He then procured barracks for my Company and furnished with Blanks to take on. I then sent my wounded men off to Albany. Applied for kettles for my Comp., but in vain; obliged to mix our flour in our hats and bake it upon Chips before the fire and broil our salt beef upon the rods.

"Thur. 10th.—Continued to my barracks, sent for a Doctor—none could attend—no appetite to food.

"Frid. 11.—Applied by an officer to Gen. Schuyler to go down the river to recruit my health; could not obtain it.

"Sat. 12.—Genl. St. Clair, Post, Patterson's Troop arrived. Gen. Nixon's Brigade marched into camp in the Evening, Genl. Post, having heard that I was sick, came with Col. Long & Maj. McClintock to see me and gave me liberty to go to Saratoga to recruit.

"Sun. 13th.—Set off on horseback and rode to Fort Miller, where I met with Col. Scammell, then proceeded to Saratoga, but the inhabitants being alarmed by the Tories, who every night were plundering houses, were moving off, therefore, I was obliged to ride until 12 at night before I could get a lodging. Lodged at Mr. Van Vanders.

"Mond. 14th.—Set off and with Still Water, could get no entertainment; rode to "Half-Moon."

Upon the above return is the following:

"Bill of Loss.

The above being in Captain Gray's handwriting, it is safe to conclude that it is what was lost on his retreat from Sheensborough to Fort Ann, July 6, 1777.

"To Captain James Gray:

"You are hereby empowered, immediately, to enlist a Company to consist of Eighty-eight able-bodied and effective men, including Non-Commissioned Officers and Privates, as Soldiers in the Service of the Colony, to defend and secure the Harbour of Boston, and cause them to pass Muster as soon as possible at Boston.

"Boston, 14th Day of May, 1776.

"THE MENSURERS' OATH:

"We, the Subscribers, her-by severally enlist Ourselves into the Service of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, to serve in a Company whereof James Gray is Captain, until the first day of December next, unless the Service should about their discharge sooner, and which we do engage to furnish and carry with us into the Service a good, effective Fire Arm and Bayonet, if to be obtained, Cartridge Box, Knapsack and Blanket, and when found we engage to march to the Town of Boston, or such Place within the Colony as the General Court of said Colony shall appoint; and do hereby oblige Ourselves faithfully to observe and obey all such orders as we shall from Time to Time receive from our Superior Officers.

"May 30th, Seth Richardson; June 24, Joseph Dale; June 29, Joseph Hillbert; June 30th, James H. Terry; June 12th, John Moley; June 13th, John Holman; June 13th, John H. H. Hinson, Jun.; June 13th, Benjamin Jeffrey; June 14th, David Tolton."

An evidence of the generosity and benevolence of the early inhabitants is shown by the following subscription-paper found among the papers of the late Captain James Gray:

"Whereas, by a late distressing fire, in the Town of Portsmouth, in 1799, the Inhabitants are deprived, not only of their houses, but also of their but even of a common shelter at this inauspicious season; and, in order to fulfill a duty in and for our fellow-citizens, we, the undersigned, do, with our power, by extending the 10th of said Act, appropriate the following sum to the purpose aforesaid:

"The sum, &c. the subscribers, in addition to the £1500 of 1799, do, voluntarily subscribe the sum hereunto contained, respectively to be particularly appropriated to the relief of the distressed and destitute in the Town of Portsmouth, whereon the said sum is to be disbursed, always, a promise to pay the same to the committee appointed for the purpose in an Epson by the 1st day of February, 1801.

FRANKLIN.

Congregational Church. This church was organized June 11, 1822, under the advice and direction of Revs. Samuel Wood and Ebenezer Price, both of Boscawen; Rev. Thomas Worcester, of Salisbury; and Rev. Abraham Bobwell, of Sambornton, who was appointed by the church its first moderator. A Church Covenant and Confession of Faith was at that time adopted and signed by fourteen persons.

The church edifice, in which the society still continues to worship, was erected in 1820, from funds raised by subscription and the sale of pews. It was built upon a very eligible lot, the gift of Ebenezer Eastman, in what was then known as Republican Village, in Salisbury, by residents of four adjacent towns representing different denominations, the Congregationalists predominating. Portions of these four towns, including Republican village, were, December 21, 1828, formed into the town of Franklin. The bell still in use was purchased and placed upon the house, when finished, by individual subscriptions, the only subscriber now living being Richard Jenkins, of Franklin.

During the first eight years after the house was built, worship was maintained through the assistance of several ministers of the gospel, a complete list of whom, unfortunately, is not found in the records, who served for short periods only; but November 16, 1828, Rev. Joseph Lane became acting pastor and served for more than two years. He was succeeded by Rev. Benjamin P. Stone, who was ordained the first pastor of the church and society May 26, 1831, and dismissed May 2, 1832. The ministrations of Revs. D. D. Tappan and Samuel Nichols, who served as acting pastors, extended over the next four and a half years, the former serving about one, and the latter about three and a half years. Its second pastor, Rev. Isaac Knight, was installed September 27, 1837, and dismissed December 21, 1848.

Rev. William T. Savage, its third pastor, was installed September 4, 1849. His able and faithful ministrations covered a period of exactly a quarter of a century.

The fourth pastor of the church, Rev. Austin H. Barr, then a recent graduate of Andover Seminary, was ordained and installed over the church November 3, 1875. Mr. Barr was succeeded by Rev. W. A. Hadley and Rev. H. M. Andrews, acting pastors.

In 1831 and the two subsequent years a doctrinal controversy prevailed in the society, which resulted in the surrender of the church edifice for a brief period to those of Unitarian views, who, soon finding themselves incapable of maintaining worship, resurrendered it to those of Orthodox faith, who have advanced in number and strength to the present time.

For many years previous to the ministry of Dr. Savage, the church received pecuniary aid from the New Hampshire Missionary Society, but during the last quarter of a century or more it has been a self-sustaining church. It has, moreover, contributed liberally to the support of many of the worthy institutions and benevolent objects of the day.

In 1834 through the agency of Benjamin Woodbury, formerly of New London in this State, a scholarship was founded for Oberlin College, Ohio. Parker Noyes, Esq., Dr. Jesse Merrill and Deacon Dearborn Sanborn, all members of the church, were the principal contributors to this object. The church also took an early and decided stand in regard to the question of temperance. September 6, 1834, Deacon Paul Noyes at a church meeting moved the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That no person shall be admitted as a member of this church who does not adopt the total abstinence principles of the day in regard to the use of ardent spirits.*

The enjoyment of special seasons of religious interest and precious in-gatherings had not been withheld from its experience.

Several years since, the church edifice was extensively repaired by the pew-holders at an expense of about fifteen hundred dollars. More recently, in 1876-77, the society secured ownership of the old academy building and lot, enlarged and reconstructed the house, converting it into one of the best vestries in the State, with excellent facilities for Sabbath-school and social religious work, and convenient apartments for both a Sabbath-school and a public library, at an aggregate cost of more than three thousand dollars.

PEMBROKE.

The Langmaid Murder.—On the 4th day of October, 1874, the quiet community of Pembroke was aroused by the news of a terrible crime committed in their midst. Josie A. Langmaid, a daughter of James F. Langmaid, a prosperous farmer living on Buck Street, was brutally murdered by a fiend in human guise on her way to school at the Pembroke Academy. She was scarcely eighteen years of age, and was generally beloved by all who knew her. Her murderer was twice tried by the highest courts of the State and convicted by a chain of circumstantial evidence. He was hung in the prison at Concord March 15, 1878. His very name should be obliterated from the annals of the State.

The details of the murder were of the most atrocious character, unfit for the ears of the rising generation, but the memory of the murdered maiden-student, kept alive in song and story, will long survive. A commemorative monument on Academy Street marks the place of the cruel deed and testifies to the love and respect in which she was held by her townspeople.

Jewell Lodge, No. 94, A. F. A. M.—Jewell Lodge, named in honor of Colonel David L. Jewell, of this village, was organized April 7, 1879, working under a dispensation which was granted October 20, 1879, from the Grand Lodge, until May 19, 1889, when a charter was granted to Edmund E. Truesdell, Augustus B. Johnson, John P. Johnson, Charles Williams, David L. Jewell, George H. Larabee, George P. Cofran, Nathaniel Head, George P. Little, Oscar B. Truesdell, Enoch H. Holt, James M. Young, Frederick E. Northrop, Joel N. Corbin, Otis S. Eastman, William Wainwright, Lewis S. Dunbar, Henry M. Hadley, Martin R. Sawyer, John B. Haselton, Charles P. Bridgman, Josiah W. Dudley, Edwin P. Northrop, Retire M. Davis, Benjamin L. Culver, Joseph L. Hosmer, William F. Head, George A. Robie, Eben H. Nutting, Samuel S. Ordway, Charles P. Morse, Addison N. Osgood, Alonzo Osgood, Charles F. Hildreth, Clifton B. Hildreth and Charles A. Seavey, who, realizing from the beginning that liberal contributions and increasing executive labor were the most essential requisitions for the future prosperity and success of the work before them, began at once to lay the foundation of what is to-day one of the most prosperous and flourishing lodges within the Masonic jurisdiction of the State. Its first officers were George H. Larabee, Worshipful Master; Charles P. Bridgman, Senior Warden; George P. Little, Junior Warden; Charles Williams, Treasurer; John P. Haselton, Secretary; Oscar B. Truesdell, Senior Deacon; Enoch H. Holt, Junior Deacon; Frederick A. Northrop, Senior Steward; Henry M. Hadley, Junior Steward; George W. Ruland, Chaplain; William Wainwright Tiler. But one death has occurred among its charter members up to the present time,—that of our beloved Brother Nathaniel Hend—who has gone, we trust, to a higher and brighter Lodge; a good man and true brother, ever ready to stretch forth a helping hand with a free and liberal heart; beloved in life and mourned in death. To Worshipful Brother Edmund E. Truesdell we are indebted for the energy, perseverance and correspondence necessarily required in collecting the portraits of all the charter members, which are grouped in a massive gilt frame, in all respects a combination of good taste and artistic skill, and placed in a position assigned it upon the wall of our reception parlor, there to remain through the ages that are to come. The Past Masters are George H. Larabee, Charles P. Bridgman and Edmund E. Truesdell, and let us here add that too much credit cannot be given to these three brothers for the increasing efforts which they have at all times manifested to render whatever assistance in their power, financially and socially, that would tend to make its work harmonize with the pure principles contained in the order. In 1880 Jewell Lodge, by invitation of Andrew Buntin, then Grand Master, exemplified the work in the third degree before the Grand Lodge of New Hampshire, and although at that time being the youngest lodge in the State, it won from the craft unexcelled praise for the acceptable manner in which it performed the work assigned it, and it was at this time that Jewell Lodge took its rank among the best working lodges in the State, a position which, by its harmonious and increasing efforts it has maintained up to the present time. Its hall, reception and banquet rooms were fitted up in an elegant and elaborate manner, at an expense of about two thousand dollars, being all paid for and a balance in the treasury when the lodge was dedicated, showing the deep interest and liberality which characterized its charter members, who have contributed many valuable gifts to the lodge, among which was a beautiful and costly set of jewels, presented by David L. Jewell, and I think the aim of Jewell Lodge has ever been liberality and nobility of purpose, always realizing that it is the high character to which its credit has attained that has brought Masonry from beyond the dark ages, and it is its character which will carry the noble work on through an unknown future till time shall be no more.

Although Masonry may, by some of the uninitiated, be considered as derogatory to the advancement of man, yet the experience of ages has taught the conservative and thinking mind that it is an institution whose moral, social and intellectual attainments are so deeply rooted in the heart of civilized society and indorsed by so many great and good men of every age and country, that its advancement is essential to the welfare of a true and noble cause, and, to more fully demonstrate this fact, ancient history informs us that it has been the usual and almost universal custom for even monarchs, for a season, since the reign of the wise King of Israel, to lay aside the sceptre and descend the throne, to partake of the mysteries and mingle with the assemblies of the order.

CANTERBURY.

JOSEPH CLOUGH.

Joseph Clough was one of the most prominent men in the political, religious and business affairs of the town for many years.

His life covered nearly a century, and during his active manhood he was diligent and energetic.

He was born in Canterbury February 1, 1757, in the Mansion House, where he spent his life, and where he died, March 24, 1855. He was born during the second term of Washington's administration, and died subsequent to the commencement of Cleveland's administration; thus he lived under the administrations of all the Presidents of the United States.

His grandfather, Thomas Clough, came to Canterbury from Salisbury, Mass., very soon after the town was chartered, probably about 1735. The record of the marriage of this Thomas Clough in Canterbury was the 10th of December, 1741. The father of Joseph was born August 29, 1754.

This family was among the earliest settlers of the town and many of the descendants of it still live there.

Joseph Clough was a pioneer in the cause of temperance, and was true to it through his whole life in theory and practice. His example in this particular never contributed a reproach or a weakness.

He was careful and correct in the transaction of such business as is often necessary to be done between neighbors in country towns where there are no educated lawyers, such as conveying property, disposing of estates by wills and settlements under them, much of which he did and so well.

He was elected a member of the Executive Council in 1818 and 1829.

He married Mable Ann Ambrose Chase, daughter of Stephen Chase, of Northfield, May 31, 1817. She survived him thirteen days.

In 1818 he was ordained a minister of the Free Will Baptist denomination, and for many years preached in the church in what is called the "Baptist District" in the town, and elsewhere in the neighboring towns.

His Christian life was characterized by a constant and steadfast devotion, by a belief that did not weaken when death approached, by a piety that was not deferred nor abandoned when time was almost pressing, and by its conviction that a full redemption through the many vicissitudes and trials of a long life.

He was a representative man in his day and time, one whose name is mentioned in the records of his species, that it was much to be desired that he should have, as a consequence of his business, more, a worthy example, and a faithful Christian, to the end of his
